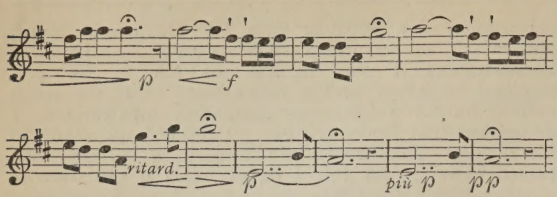
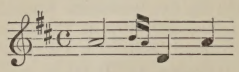
methods. Whether the work be a Symphony or a Concerto is perfectly immaterial. To expect minute accuracy in a critic who has read Berlioz's Memoirs and discovered the existence of Gluck is—shall we say?—unpardonable effrontery. But to revert to our Dudelsack. In the interpretation of the caressing and—shall we say?—[Oh, yes! for goodness sake say anything you like.—ED.] Corybantic cachinnations which stud the Finale with their pellucid effluvium, the orchestra, indeed, attained, perhaps, let us say, almost, if not quite, on the whole, to a plane of delicious distinction. Dudelsack the conductor, it is true, is still somewhat to seek. He lacks the Jove-like calm of Richter, the dæmonic chryselephantine delirium of Mottl, the fanatical finesse of Levi. Still, on the whole, one must not ask too much of a boy of eleven. And already he is immense, Goliardic, Abracadabrous, with the features of a sub-tropical Shelley and the translunar hysteria of a nebulous Bollandist. His gestures, in particular, have a certain convincing bizarrerie which is entirely Quasimodal. Under his persuasive beat the very trombones exhaled a softness and sweetness that were overwhelming, we had almost said Xanadu-like. On the whole, then, we are profoundly impressed with the delicate—shall we say?—accomplishment, or perhaps we should rather say the accomplished delicacy of our Dudelsack. Never has an artist swum into our ken more richly or radiantly endowed with the supreme qualities of—well—distinction, delicacy, and accomplishment. We feel sure that Berlioz, could he revisit the glimpses of the moon, would have rejoiced at the exquisite efflorescence of erotism which, perhaps, maybe, indeed, shall we say? positively exudes from the score of Dudelsack's Opus 1. We know that his magnificent melodic genius would have endeared him to Gluck. We are ready to lay crippling odds that the late Cardinal Newman would have hailed him with ecstasy. We know, in conclusion, and what more need be said? that to us, at any rate, he is a loveable, delicate, distinguished, vital, and accomplished Thing.



II.

(THE TRUCULENT.)



Although the infernal idiot of an agent who looks after the seating of the representatives of the Press had placed me in the most malarious and draughty spot in the whole of that ghastly and godforsaken hippodrome which greasy sycophants have called the Royal Albert Hall, I am free to confess that Dudelsack's amazing Symphony steeped me in the purest ecstasy for fifty minutes yesterday evening. It is true that I sneezed fifty-four times in the course of the slow movement, and in consequence lost some of the most ethereal and filmy effects of Dudelsack's scoring, but for that the brutal ass of an agent is responsible, not I. Still, apart from the draught and the proximity of a gaping crétin of a Professor from the Royal College of Music, I have seldom attended a more enjoyable Concert. Dudelsack attracted me from the first, before I ever heard a note of his music, by his splendid revolt against the effete traditions of pedantry and academicism. My heart went out to the brave child who cursed Mendelssohn in his cradle, hissed Brahms at a Concert in Hamburg while he was still in petticoats, and boxed his mother's ears when she suggested that if he really loved music he ought to study at the Berlin Hochschule. Dudelsack has been frankly Pagan from the outset, and for that I am prepared to grovel before him—nay, even to lick his boots. His visit to England has already done incalculable good. The blithering pedants of Tenterden Street and the despicable dunces—half charlatan, half ape—of Kensington Gore are already shaking in their shoes. If only the County Council have the sense to offer him a paltry £5,000 a year as general director of public music, Dudelsack is prepared to take up his residence permanently in England and lead an armed revolt against the directors of the Philharmonic Society, the Royal College and Royal Academy of Music, and the Bach Choir Society. More than that, he has advocated the assassination of all the musical critics, except myself and one other; the conversion of Westminster Abbey into an opera house; the destruction of that monstrous reredos in St. Paul's; a public bonfire of all copies of the "Elijah"; the execution of Mackenzie, Parry, and Stanford; the overthrow of the monarchy; and the substitution of a Republic with Mr. Dolmetsch, Mottl, and myself as an irresponsible triumvirate. In these circumstances it was natural for me to be predisposed in favour of the new-comer. But the result entirely transcended my most sanguinary anticipations. I do not say that Dudelsack has yet reached the zenith of his powers. That would be strange in a lad only just turned eleven. But this I do say, that if you were to glorify a billion times the most successful creative effort of Parry or Stanford, it would still fall immeasurably short of the most perfunctory piece of padding in Dudelsack's Opus 1. For here is no anæmic, knock-kneed, mattoid outgrowth of the fetish-worship of the schools, but a rich, sumptuous, full-blooded Zolaistic carnival of antinomian sonority. The dovecotes of Brixton will, no doubt, be fluttered, and the pundits of Peckham lift their paralytic hands in pious horror; but who nowadays cares a twopenny tinker's curse for the menaces of these plaster Torquemadas? We happily live in an age in which we can stretch out our hands and take the fruit—forbidden for choice—which hangs in the garden of life. Dudelsack is not merely gloriously Pagan and adorably antinomian; he is also uncompromisingly anti-clerical and superbly anti-Semitic. The very first notes of the opening movement sound a trumpet blast of defiance against the Biblical shoddy of that miserable impostor Mendelssohn. No bishop could sit out the Scherzo without blushing to his very boots. The Allegro feroce is a damning indictment of voluntary schools. The Finale is one long Secularist pæan, while the superb Coda points to Devil-worship and Nihilism as the joint and only means of our social salvation. In the working-out section there is a curious passage which will probably cause dire searchings of heart among the dunderheaded dolts who misrepresent our "leading contemporaries." To save their addled brains unnecessary and possibly dangerous exertion, it may be as well if I point out that the two hidden fifths are, as anyone with the intellect of a normal pork butcher could not fail to see, the harmonic equivalent of the submerged tenth, whose emancipation from the fetters of a corrupt and katabolic capitalism is typified with such triumphant insistence in the ensuing fugato. Perhaps the best tribute to Dudelsack's genius is the significant fact that even I have vainly ransacked my extensive vocabulary in the quest of adjectives sufficiently violent, lurid, and extravagant to do justice, on the one hand, to its pyramidal loveliness, and, on the other, to my hatred and loathing of all those who venture to differ from me.

FEW things are more instructive to students of our art, or more interesting to the intelligent music-lover, than the first sketches made by great musicians of works that have afterwards become famous. A particularly valuable specimen of this kind has just been made public in the pages of our French contemporary, Le Ménestrel. It consists of a fac-simile of Wagner's autograph sketch of the prelude (for corno inglese) to the Shepherd's Song in "Tannhäuser." This precious autograph belongs to M. Charles Malherbe, whose permission to use it in the manner described was given to the well-known musical antiquary M. Julien Tiersot. It naturally furnishes that singularly able writer with material for a capital little article. We transcribe the melody as jotted down by the composer, in order that those of our readers who care to do so may compare it with the published version (it occurs on page 50 of Novello's Octavo Edition):—

but went no farther, and, leaving the rest of this stave and the following one empty, began again, as seen above. It will be noticed that the prelude as published is exclusively made out of the first five bars of the sketch, which are amplified to occupy twelve ; that the eighth and ninth bars become the first and second bars of the song itself; and that the tenth and eleventh bars are reserved for the little pipe tune which runs through the Chorus of Pilgrims that follows the Shepherd's Song. Such is the care with which genius economises its materials.

We have read with no little interest the hints on "How to get a song published," which appear in the columns of a weekly journal addressed primarily to the spindle side of creation. The writer starts off with the somewhat significant statement that owing to the "great increase in the number of musical institutions, and of facilities for obtaining a sound musical education, there has naturally been a considerable increase in the number of amateur composers." If the education be really "sound," the product ought not to be amateurish; but if we omit the adjective, there can be no question as to the relation of cause and effect set forth in the words we have quoted. The advice to the aspiring amateur to "see that her manuscript is legibly written" is excellent; so also is the recommendation to exercise a discriminating choice in the matter of the words. Apropos of the practice on the part of song-writers commencing—we borrow the phrase from the tobacco trade—of submitting new settings of lyrics already linked to famous airs, the writer of the article tells a delightful story of a London publisher who was recently offered a new setting of "God save the Queen," by an enthusiast who fondly imagined that the traditional tune would give way to that of his own creation! Best of all of these pieces of advice, however, is the following: "In order to avoid anything in the way of technical irregularities, the beginner should, wherever practicable, submit the manuscript to a professional musician before sending it to a publisher. This may save a lot of heart-burning, for a song which may really have the elements of success in it may fail to secure favourable consideration owing to the presence of technical errors; while, on the one hand, mistakes of a technical character should be carefully avoided, on the other, the composer must take care not to be too pedantic." But the greatest advantage of adopting this method has been overlooked by the writer. The expert, if he be honest as well as competent, may altogether dissuade the budding composer from carrying her unnecessary wares to an already overstocked market.

The eleventh annual Conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, to be held at Edinburgh on the last day of the old and the first three days of the New Year, promises to be one of the most brilliant and important yet held by the Society. The chairmen for the four days are respectively Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Mr. Randegger, Professor Niecks, and Professor Prout. In addition to the usual banquet, receptions, balls, concerts, organ recitals, the following papers will be read: "Some characteristics of Scottish Music," Mr. W. Hately; "Technical Instruction in Pianoforte Playing," Mr. A. K. Virgil; "On the Association of Tonal and Verbal Speech," Professor Niecks; "The bitter cry of the children: a protest against irrationalism in teaching what are called the 'Elements' of Music," Mr. Franklin Petersen; "The Orchestra in 1800 and 1900," Professor Prout; "Choral Associations," Mr. T. Roylands Smith; and "The Influence of the five-octave Keyboard on Beethoven's Pianoforte Works," Mr. S. Midgley. Sir Alexander Mackenzie will deliver the opening address on the morning of the 31st ult.; on the 2nd inst. he will be laureated as Doctor of Music by the Vice-President of the University in the Music Class Room; and in the evening he will conduct a grand Choral and Orchestral Concert, given by the Edinburgh Choral Union and Scottish Orchestra, the programme of which includes his own "Cotter's Saturday Night," "From the North" pieces, and the famous "Pibroch," the solo part of which will be played by Mr. John Dunn. The Lord Provost of Edinburgh will preside at the opening of the Conference, and, with the Magistrates and Council of the City, will give a Reception and Ball on the 3rd inst. Add to these attractions an afternoon "visit to places of interest in Edinburgh," and it appears likely that the Society's visit to "Auld Reekie" will be pleasurably remembered for a long time to come. This, be it noted, is the first Conference held in Scotland.

It is 150 years ago this month since Dr. Arne's "Tempest" music was first performed. The actual date was January 31, 1746. The General Advertiser of that day announced: "Drury Lane. Never Acted there before. By His Majesty's Company of Comedians. At the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, this Day will be presented a Play, call'd The Tempest, as written by Shakespeare . . . with the original Decorations, particularly the Grand Masque, new set to Musick by Mr. Arne. The Part of Ariel (with the proper Songs) by Mrs. Clive." Happy Kitty Clive to be the original singer of that delightful song "Where the bee sucks!"—a song which is not only typically English in character, but which retains all the freshness and charm of perennial youth, although it is 150 years old. "Where the bee sucks" is in itself sufficient to place its composer upon the roll of fame; but when to this can be added "Rule, Britannia," the name of Arne is destined to last as long as the British nation. Meanwhile, "Many happy returns of the day" to "Where the bee sucks" on its 150th birthday.

We have read with pleasure a thoughtful and acute article on "The Popular Song" in a recent issue of the National Observer, in which the writer comments with effective illustrations on the decline of disinterested patriotism as manifested in the ditties of the music hall. Songs like "We don't want to fight" and "Tommy Atkins" are the exceptions. "What has been the most widely whistled ditty of the past few months? 'Her golden hair was hanging down her back,' in which fun is made of a country maiden's contamination by town influences." It is worthy of notice that M. Daudet, when he was paying us a visit, expressed his disgust at what he called this "tawdry Pæan of bourgeois Don Juans." The writer points out, with justice, that the popular song, whatever its literary and ethical shortcomings, generally embodies a catching tune. "Much as one may detest the words of 'Her golden hair was hanging down her back,' one finds oneself humming the tune in an unguarded moment. Let it be conceded, too, that in most cases the popular song has some turn or suspicion of humour or feeling, and has at the least a quaintness or a comicality allied to its vulgarity. There is usually an idea of some sort—occasionally there is pathos of some kind or degree—in the songs which Mr. Chevalier (who has also been indulging in autobiography) submits to the notice of the public. Still, taking them as they are in the bulk, the ditties which now commend themselves to the mass of English people are not on a very high plane of art or fun or sentiment. Better 'Cheer, boys, cheer,' after all, than the latest brilliances of the variety theatres."

This is the jubilee year of the production of Mendelssohn's oratorio of "Elijah," which was first performed at the Birmingham Musical Festival of 1846. In commemoration of this event, Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. will issue in the spring "The History of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah,'" a work upon which the author, Mr. F. G. Edwards, has been engaged for some time past. The book will contain much fresh information from original sources, upon the libretto, composition, and production of Mendelssohn's great Oratorio. Many interesting letters from the composer to his friends Klingemann, Schubring, Bartholomew, and others will be made public for the first time. A hitherto unpublished portrait of Mendelssohn, portraits of Bartholomew and Staudigl, and other illustrations will be included in the volume, which will also contain the fac-simile of a long letter (in English) from Mendelssohn to Bartholomew, his English translator. Sir George Grove has kindly promised to contribute an "Introduction."

PIANO-FORTE.

It's bold, and yet I dare to say—
Although an ignoramus—
One little word to those who play,
The gentlemen so famous.

The title of these lines will do
As text. Observe piano
Is first and most important too;
It is not forte, ah, no!

"Piano," too, is used alone
In common conversation,
So I believe, by our own,
Or any other nation.

More generous than all of us,
Performers have endeavoured
To compensate poor forte, thus
From proud piano severed.

O pianists, you've striven to Revive the part neglected,
So much that poor piano you
Have utterly rejected!

At times, no doubt, when great fatigue
Diminishes your powers,
You play some quiet piece by Grieg
We'd listen to for hours.

To your great skill, of course, I bow,
Yet pardon my suggesting
You've done enough for forte now—
Try longer spells of resting.

You must not think that when you play
We want to sleep—mere dozers—
Some others have a word to say,
I mean the poor composers.

Composers, not disturbers, see;
That is not much your sort, eh?
Still, when they write a little "p"
It cannot stand for forte.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

Mr. Whately W. Ingall has published another letter on the subject of local orchestras, and, in it, refers to some adverse criticisms of the plan suggested in his first communication—criticism proceeding from me, and appearing in the columns of The Musical Times. On this matter, I have only to say now that, after further consideration with a desire to recognise whatever in Mr. Ingall's plan is resonable and practical, I am, like the man who was convinced against his will, precisely of the same opinion still. As to the object in view, there is no difference between us. We both desire the creation of local orchestras, and part company only on the question of ways and means. Mr. Ingall would support orchestras out of the rates, I contend that the idea is, at present, impracticable, and efforts to realise it a waste of force.

Mr. Ingall marshals various opinions which he takes to be in support of his plan, mentioning, first, a favourable communication from "a distinguished and world-renowned conductor." But, inasmuch as neither the name of this authority nor his words are given, the value of the testimony cannot be appraised. Mr. Manns is quoted as saying that every town ought to have a permanent orchestra, and as believing that, "in the course of time," this will be an accomplished fact. So we all hope and believe. Sir Joseph Barnby is of one mind with Mr. Manns. So are we all of one mind. But the main point at issue is untouched by these gentlemen. Mr. Ingall should have given us their opinion as to the practicability of an orchestral rate.

And such a rate! I wonder if even Mr. Ingall, worthy and well-intentioned citizen as I am sure he is, would have courage enough to stand up before a meeting of householders and propose, (1) the building of a suitable concert-hall; (2) the engagement of a permanent orchestra of recognised ability, and numbering not less than fifty performers; (3) the employment of a really capable conductor? These, however, are what Mr. Ingall styles his "fundamentals." Has he counted the cost of them? Has he enquired how many thousands of pounds would be necessary for purchasing land in a big town and in a convenient position; for erecting a concert-hall, which, of course, must be a large one; for the salaries of fifty able artists and an accomplished conductor; for the thousand-and-one outgoings inseparable from carrying on such an enterprise? Has he also chosen a typical borough, and estimated how much in the pound would have to be exacted from ratepayers to meet the cost of his scheme? Apparently he has not done so, as the figures are not put before us.

Says Mr. Ingall: "If the public wish their minds fed by ecstatic and endurable music, assuredly they must pay for it." No doubt, but is the converse true—namely, that those who do not wish to be so nourished should not be called upon to pay? Mr. Ingall thinks not, and would send the demand note round to all alike.

Mr. Ingall, I am glad to see, faces the question as to where sufficient orchestral performers "of recognised ability" are to be found. He has been in correspondence with various London music schools, and discovered that there are, in the four principal ones, 956 orchestral pupils, with an average of four years' instruction. These, he calculates, would form nineteen orchestras, "of recognised ability," to start with.

Here also I must ask a question or two. Has Mr. Ingall troubled to enquire how many of his 956 orchestral students are amateurs; and how many of them possess, or bid fair to possess, the requisite skill for orchestral work? But, most of all, does he know how large a majority study the violin and violoncello? How many viola and double-bass players are in the 956; how many oboists, clarinettists, trombonists, and so on? He does know, it seems, in a general way, for Mr. Hilton Carter has told him that the pupils preferring strings "greatly predominate," by which I suppose is meant predominate greatly in excess of the proper proportion. Mr. Ingall hopes, however, that this difficulty could be got over.

For the reasons pointed out above, I must still regard Mr. Ingall's scheme as unpractical and delusive. Much, very much, will have to be done before it can be brought within the region of the possible—before the average British ratepayer will tax himself to provide public concerts, and our Schools equip the orchestras, if voted, with able performers and conductors. "Hasten slowly" is an excellent proverb; so is "More haste, less speed."

One of our Western cities boasts a remarkable professor of singing, who is also a pianoforte tuner and polisher. This gentleman prepares pupils for the R.A.M. and T.C.L. examinations, guaranteeing that everyone will pass within six months. He does something else also, but that must be described in his own words: "As there are many gentlemen using their voices bass for tenor, or vice versa; Ladies con-contralto for soprano, or vice versa, which causes a straining to the chest, and thereby losing the beauty of the voice, Professor —— will prove and give the right compass for the voice, and tell how to use it, for the fee of 2s. 6d. The same will be charged to prove to any one whether they will make professional pianoforte or violin players." Truly knowledge is cheap, and the English language difficult!

From the North comes information that, at a certain performance of the "Hymn of Praise," "the band did really able work, working up from the Allegro, which gives such colour to the Hymn as a whole, to the Allegretto agitato of delighted unison, that finds vent in the religioso movement preceding the first chorus!"

With reference to a statement quoted in last month's Musical Times to the effect that Arthur, Duke of Wellington, did not know one tune from another, a correspondent sends an extract from the Illustrated London News of 1852, in which it is said, "The Duke, like his father (Earl of Mornington), had a great love for music," &c. I cannot, at the moment, refer to a precise authority on the question, but it will, I think, be found, by those who search, that the Iron Duke was a director of the Antient Concerts, and took his turn on duty, it being the privilege of such "noble patrons" actively to manage the performances in rotation.

The Churchwoman of November 11 contained a singular letter from the Rev. F. W. Davis, of Blairgowrie, N.B. It appears that the musical reviewer attached to the journal in question, when noticing a Harvest Anthem composed by Mr. Davis, pointed out that he had used certain words to which music had already been set by Sir John Stainer. The reverend gentleman was not a whit abashed by the reviewer's observations, though he professed to be greatly amazed. Says he, cheerily: "I made choice of the words 'Ye shall dwell,' &c., simply because Sir J. Stainer had chosen them before me. I approved his selection, but believed I could give them a more melodious treatment than he, and the result has been that many people prefer my composition to his because I have succeeded in doing so, and because it is 'quite unpretentious' and easier for most choirs to sing. Some reviewers have made a comparison between the two compositions, and expressed a preference for mine, and quite rightly."

Mr. Davis should be happy in so far as satisfaction with his own music, helped by a sense of superiority to others, can make him so. As yet, however, he has not rivalled the Yorkshireman who, some years since, submitted to Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. a new "Messiah," pleading that the public would like a change from Handel's music to his own. The Yorkshireman is at present an easy first.

Mr. John H. Greene, honorary secretary of the Leeds Philharmonic Society, writes:—

In the December number of The Minstrel there appears an advertisement presumably from the officials of this Society, stating that a Conductor is wanted, and asking for testimonials to be sent to the Hon. Secs.

The advertisement has not been officially sent by the Leeds Philharmonic Society, and I have written for an explanation to the Editor of the paper, but have received no reply.

I regret to say that I have received applications from various quarters, and gentlemen have been subjected to much trouble in the matter quite needlessly, as we have no vacancy.

Has anything happened—which Heaven forefend—to Dr. J. F. Bridge? I see, in the Pall Mall Gazette, that Dr. Martin is now organist of Westminster Abbey.

Here is, in excelsis, an illustration of the old Puritan spirit. Even Mr. C. H. Spurgeon sanctioned the dance, provided partners were of the same sex; but I am informed that a certain pre-eminently pious journal issued in the metropolis lately refused an advertisement because the mere word "dance" appeared in it. I don't understand this sort of witness against the world, the flesh, and the devil, but I can respect the earnestness which sacrifices profit to principle. So disinterested a feeling should be prized in proportion to its rarity in the religious world.

In October last a certain artist desired to make an arrangement with the Paris edition of the New York Herald, to the end that her doings in America might promptly and fully be made known in Europe. The Paris editor not only declined, but published the singer's letter, with some comments of his own. He should not have done so, and he would not have done so had he reflected that the development of women has extended even to the defence one of another. "A Woman" promptly felt it her duty, "as a woman," to resent the editorial "insult." She told the editor he was personally a coward, and that his paper did not circulate beyond its few advertisers. Will it be believed that the incorrigible man published this letter also?

Latest definition of Paderewski: "A lemon-haired wizard who plays us into a hypnotic trance." Future definition of music: "The consequence and cause of nervous disorders."

I read in a Transatlantic journal about "the severance of relations between Mr. Anton Seidl and the Seidl Society." Heavens! No wonder the American people want to fight somebody for the sake of distraction.

Overheard in a New York street car:—Average Young Man (to neighbour). "Everything they say about Paderewski is true. He's a perfect genius. Why, he played fourteen pieces and did not once look at the programme. Yet he played straight ahead and never once forgot what piece was to come next. I tell you the man who can do that is a dandy."

I am sorry to hear that Madame Bauermeister has been robbed, in a New York hotel, of a gold watch and diamond ring. Madame Bauermeister not being exactly a prima donna (though cleverer than most) I quite believe the statement.

Scene: the Lyceum Theatre, after performance of "Dido and Æneas." Modern Young Man: "I shall have to go and see the 'Mikado' to-night, to take the taste out of my mouth."

Scene: the ticket office, Royal Albert Hall, just before performance of Parry's Ode and Haydn's "Creation." Archaic Young Man to Clerk: "How long will this new thing take?" Clerk: "About an hour." Archaic Young Man: "Thanks; we will come back in an hour's time."

The Chicago Indicator really must not. It copies from an English journal a very silly concert notice (which that paper itself reproduced from a provincial sheet as a warning) and heads it "A Sample English Criticism." A sample, according to Webster, is "a part of anything presented for inspection, or intended to be shown, as evidence of the quality of the whole." The Indicator must see that, had this particular criticism been a sample, it would not have been reproduced in England as something to wonder or laugh at. We British critics really are not, as a body, capable of saying about a violinist: "Combined with an almost faultless style of double-stopping, she is able to reach great elevation, even on the back strings."

Notice of a "grand popular (Sunday) concert" in a New York music hall attracted thither a bejewelled person, who, looking over his programme, was heard to mutter: "Well, this is a good graft to spring on a man that's paid good money to get in. Who the —— was Beet-hoven anyhow?" Was he a sample American, O Indicator?

The Berlin conductor, Weingartner, has, it appears, been criticising his brethren of the bâton, some of whom he describes as "tempo rubato conductors." The personal vanity of these brethren is such that "they are not content to execute a work as the composer intended, but wish to show the public what they could have made of it had they been in the composer's place. The conductor's desire for applause is placed higher than the genius of the composer." Thus Mr. Weingartner, and he ought to know.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

It is not too much to say that the performance of Sir Arthur Sullivan's dramatic cantata "The Golden Legend," by the Royal Choral Society, at the Albert Hall, is one of the most pleasurably anticipated Concerts of the annual series given by this fine body of vocalists. This, at least, would seem to be the just inference to be drawn from the huge audience which is wont to assemble in the capacious building whenever the work is presented, and which listened with every sign of appreciation and enjoyment to the interpretation given, on the 12th ult., under the direction of Sir Joseph Barnby. Full justice was done to the fine music on this occasion. Madame Albani sang Elsa's solos with delightful sympathy and purity of expression, Miss Clara Butt has never been heard to greater advantage than in her rendering of the part of Ursula, Mr. Lloyd Chandos used his pleasant voice with excellent effect in the solos of The Prince, and Mr. Henschel gave his usual effective reading of the part of Lucifer. A very fine interpretation was given of the choral numbers by the choir. A repetition of the beautiful "Evening Hymn" was as usual insisted upon, although Sir Joseph endeavoured to escape doing so, and the massive climax at the end of the third scene, and other dramatic passages, were sung with keen appreciation of the requirements of the music and remarkable vigour and power.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The third Concert, on November 28, began with the earliest written of the four Overtures to "Fidelio"—that played at the first performance of the opera in November, 1805, and since erroneously known as "Leonora, No. 2." In view of the high educational value of Mr. Henschel's scheme this season it is a pity that this Overture and its amended and amplified version, the glorious "No. 3," were not both heard at the same Concert. No such instructive comparison as may be made between these two masterpieces is to be found elsewhere. The Symphony was the "Eroica." Its performance showed conscientiousness, but lacked the "divine spark." We have a suspicion that at times Mr. Henschel checks rather than elicits expression from his men. When he sings or accompanies no one is more sympathetic. Should an orchestra be less demonstrative in expressing feeling than a singer or an accompanist? If so, why? The remaining Beethoven pieces were the Romance in G for violin, the solo part in which was admirably played by Miss Marie Motto, a young artist, whose obvious talent and excellent training should lead her rapidly to the front, and the scena "Ah, Perfido," which was sung by Madame Lilian Tree with fair success. The last number on the programme consisted of the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan."

At the fourth Concert, held on the 5th ult., the Beethoven numbers were the Symphony in B flat, the "Leonora" Overture, the Concerto in G for pianoforte, and the Violin Romance in F. In the absence of Miss Frida Scotta, who was to have played the last-named piece, Miss Irma Sethe undertook it, and discharged the pleasant duty so well as to materially strengthen the good opinion already formed of her gifts and acquirements. The soloist in the Concerto was Madame Haas, who played with refinement, but also without awakening the least enthusiasm. The Prelude to Act III. of "Die Meistersinger" and Berlioz's arrangement of the "Rakoczy" March completed the programme.

Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" was given at an extra Concert, on the 17th ult., the 125th anniversary of the master's birthday. The choice of this mighty work for such an occasion was thoroughly appropriate, for if Beethoven's highest aim is to be found anywhere it is here. He spent more than three years over the work, threw himself into it heart and soul, and wrote it when his style had ripened itself into what is known as his "third manner"—the period which saw the birth of such masterpieces as the last three Pianoforte Sonatas, the Choral Symphony, and the "Posthumous" Quartet, and which reveals the master striving—often with success, sometimes without it—to express thoughts and feelings not only far above and beyond any that had yet been attempted in music, but beyond the power of music in its present state to express at all. However great the achievements of a man of genius, one knows of course that his ideals must be infinitely higher still—this is a psychological law—but it is seldom given to us to witness the conflict between intention and realisation as we are able to observe it in several of the sublimest works of Beethoven's third period. For this reason those works will always possess an attraction for the few that the magnificent success of his earlier works can scarcely hope to rival. They propound problems that yet await solution and which may well occupy musicians for generations yet to come. To descend to actualities, we have nothing but praise for the performance of the Mass given by Mr. Henschel and his loyal forces, vocal and instrumental. Enthusiasm was in the air, inspired, no doubt, by the occasion, no less than by the work, and the vocal difficulties were, in consequence, attacked with a heroic disregard of physical consequences that approached sublimity. The soloists, Miss Fillunger and Miss Agnes Janson, Messrs. Hirwen Jones and Ffrangcon-Davies, sang as we have rarely heard them sing before, and the choir covered itself with glory. A word of praise should be said for Mr. Hollander's performance of the exquisite, but difficult, violin solo in the lovely Benedictus. As for Mr. Henschel, he has our warmest thanks.

MOTTL CONCERTS.

THE second and last of Mr. Schulz-Curtius's so-called "Wagner Concerts," which took place on November 26, at Queen's Hall, was marked by quite exceptionally fine performances of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" Overture. Apart from the singular clearness which distinguishes all orchestral performances given under Herr Mottl, and enables every detail of the most complex score to be heard with ease, his readings of the two masterpieces in question on this occasion must be placed among the very finest ever given in a London concert-room. The Overture was so dramatically played that to some it may even have seemed that Herr Mottl exaggerated the characteristic expression of the various themes; on others (we were among them) the power and beauty of the work impressed themselves as they had never done before, and Wagner's enthusiasm for this Overture and his interpretation of its dramatic meaning were seen to be perfectly natural and obvious. Similar insight was revealed in the rendering of the "Eroica," of which the constantly changing emotional phases—among the most subtle and poignant to be found in the whole range of art—were brought out with a sureness of touch, an alertness, an infinitude of resource, that no verbal description could do justice to. Herr Mottl's reading of the "Eroica" went farther to establish his claims to the respect of English connoisseurs than anything he has yet done. Between the Overture and Symphony was placed an arrangement for string orchestra, by J. Hellmesberger, of Bach's Sonata in E minor, originally for violin solo. It was admirably phrased, and sounded well enough; but transcriptions of this kind are entirely out of place at a high-class Concert. The second part of the programme was occupied by a selection from "Tristan," in which Frau Ida Doxat made a very successful first "appearance in England" as Isolde, and the music of Tristan and Brangane was artistically sung by Mr. Hedmondt and Miss Esther Palliser.

QUEEN'S HALL CHOIR.

THE Queen's Hall Choir, with a performance on the 11th ult. of the unjustly neglected "Samson," added to the reputation gained at the preceding Concert under the direction of Mr. Randegger. Those noble choruses "Awake, the trumpet's lofty sound," "Then round about the starry throne," and "Fixed in his everlasting seat," could not have been sung with more solidity, purpose, or the species of vigour that is dramatic without being theatrical. Under such circumstances the revival of this moving example of Handel's genius was exceedingly welcome. Miss Alice Esty was successful as the soprano soloist, Miss Dews sang with the requisite feeling "Return, O God of Hosts," Mr. Ben Davies gave touching expression to the resignation of the blind hero, Mr. Watkin Mills delivered with splendid effect "Honour and arms," and other parts were taken by Messrs. Reginald Brophy and W. A. Peterkin. The orchestra was admirable throughout.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

THE programme of the Concert of November 30 contained no novelty, but all three soloists—two instrumental and one vocal—were new to the Sydenham audience. Miss Ethel Barns, a young violinist who has made remarkable progress in the course of the last year, scored an emphatic success by her vigorous and intelligent rendering of the solo in Max Bruch's Third Concerto. Herr Reisenauer displayed great vigour, dexterity, and endurance in Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in A (No. 2), and Miss Fanny de Boufflers made a creditable début in "Elizabeth's Greeting," though her rendering of the "divisions" in "With verdure clad" admitted of considerable improvement. The orchestra distinguished itself greatly in three instrumental numbers from Berlioz's "Faust"—"The Hungarian March," "Ballet of Sylphs," and "Dance of Will o' the Wisps"—and Schumann's B flat Symphony.

On the 7th ult. special prominence was given to choral music, Brahms's noble "Schicksalslied," Goetz's graceful "Nœnia," and the chorus from Bach's Church cantata "Gottlob, nun geht das Jahr zu Ende," serving to illustrate the efficiency of the Crystal Palace Choir. Mr. W. W. Hedgcock played the lively first movement from Handel's Organ Concerto in F with considerable neatness, and Madame Roger-Miclos earned a double recall for her vigorous and brilliant rendering of the solo in Saint-Saëns's G minor Concerto, a work by turns dignified, romantic, graceful, and vulgar. She also contributed minor solos by Schubert and Liszt with success, and the programme was completed by the immortal "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert, and a group of characteristic pieces from Sir Alexander Mackenzie's set, entitled "From the North," originally written for violin and pianoforte, but now presented in an orchestral version.

In commemoration of the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of Beethoven's birth, a representative programme of that composer's works was most successfully carried out on the 14th ult. The excellence of Mr. Manns's renderings of the "Eroica" Symphony, the "Leonora" (No. 3) and the "Prometheus" Overtures is too familiar to call for comment; but a word of especial praise is due to M. Alexander Siloti, the Russian pianist, for his admirably artistic interpretation of the solo in the E flat Pianoforte Concerto. Fräulein Fillunger sang the scena "Ah, Perfido!" and two Lieder in her earnest, unaffected, and expressive style.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

THE first of these performances which it is our duty to notice in this issue is that of November 25. Mr. Piatti, who has been too long away from us owing to ill-health, has returned in full vigour, and was, of course, received with a measure of applause which must have convinced him of the esteem, we might almost say affection, in which this incomparable Italian artist is held by his English admirers. That he retains his executive powers in full was shown in the lovely Quartet of Mendelssohn in E minor (Op. 44, No. 2), admirably led by Miss Wietrowetz. The veteran violoncellist was heard as a soloist in a transcription of the third of a set of Six Sonatas for violin by Haydn, very little known, and not even mentioned by Fétis in his voluminous catalogue of the master's works. Beethoven's Sonata in B flat (Op. 22), nicely played by Miss Clotilde Kleeberg, and Brahms's concise and genial Pianoforte and Violin Sonata completed the instrumental portion of the programme, and the vocalist, Miss Margaret Petersen, a new-comer, made a very favourable impression.

On the following Saturday Mr. Piatti was again heartily greeted, and a very beautiful performance was given of Schubert's "Hungarian" Quartet in A minor (Op. 29). An interesting feature of the programme was Rubinstein's early and genial Pianoforte Trio in G minor, in which Herr Rosenthal took the keyboard part and, of course, easily carried off the honours, as the composer wrote most lovingly and powerfully for his own instrument. Adopting the plan which used to prevail at the late Mr. John Ella's Musical Union performances, the pianoforte solos were placed last in the programme, and included Liszt's favourite transcription of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in A minor, a Nocturne of Chopin, and last, but not least, a Rhapsody of Liszt. This was delivered with astounding vigour; but the word difficulty has no meaning for Herr Rosenthal, and yet he plays without exaggeration—that is to say, with self-restraint. Great praise is due to Miss Petersen for her rendering of songs by Schumann, Schytte, and two, in the original Swedish, by Kjerulf.

Very few words are needed concerning the Concert of Monday, the 2nd ult., but praise is due to Miss Agnes Zimmermann for giving Weber's Sonata in C (No. 1), for this characteristic work is not frequently heard, and she interpreted it with the utmost taste and expression. The concerted pieces were Haydn's Quartet in G (Op. 77, No. 1) and Brahms's beautiful and reflective Sonata in G for pianoforte and violin, the violinist being Miss Wietrowetz. Mr. Piatti was as impressive as ever in Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei." Miss Mary Thomas, a pupil of Mr. W. Shakespeare, may be heartily welcomed to the ranks of high-class concert vocalists. She rendered songs by Brahms and Gounod with much charm.

The Concert of the following Saturday afternoon may be even more briefly dismissed. The concerted works were Mendelssohn's genial Quartet in E flat (Op. 12) and Beethoven's even brighter Sonata in G (Op. 30, No. 3), the leader being again Miss Wietrowetz and the pianist Miss Adelina de Lara, who gave as her solos two dainty little pieces by Paderewski and Stojowski, which she played with all needful delicacy. Madame Alice Gomez was irreproachable in songs by Franz and Goring Thomas, and Mr. Piatti repeated his clever and artistic arrangement of Haydn's Sonata in C, originally written for violin with figured bass.

It would seem that not only new pianists of marvellous powers but new concert-room vocalists are coming to London in battalions. At the Concert of Monday, the 9th ult., Miss Boye, whose name we do not remember to have heard before, displayed a well trained mezzo-soprano voice in airs by Handel, Schubert, Brahms, and Grieg. The concerted works were Schumann's Quartet in A minor (Op. 41, No. 1) and Schubert's Pianoforte Trio in B flat (Op. 99), neither of which needs a word of criticism. Mr. Arbos played with infinite spirit Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G minor for violin alone, and Mr. Reisenauer, the pianist of the evening, gave pianoforte solos by Schubert with, perhaps, exuberant brilliancy.

The scheme of Saturday, the 14th ult., was mainly devoted to Beethoven, whose music is much in evidence at present. It included the favourite Quintet in C (Op. 29) and the rarely-played and not particularly interesting Sonata in D for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 102, No. 2). Mr. Arbos, who was an admirable leader, gave as his solo Wieniawski's Légende for violin, and Mr. Reisenauer displayed marvellous execution, though perhaps little Schumannesque feeling, in the "Carnaval." Madame Kate Lee sang with fine expression Schubert's song "The young Nun," and other Lieder by Brahms.

The last Concert we can mention for the present is that of Monday, the 16th ult., when the programme was again mainly devoted to Beethoven, the works given being two masterpieces, the Quartet in F (Op. 59, No. 1) and the "Waldstein" Sonata in C (Op. 53), the latter being played with fiery force by Mr. Reisenauer. The genial Pianoforte Trio in G (Op. 1, No. 2) was also played, M. Johannes Wolff being an excellent leader, though he did not play any solos. Mr. Plunket Greene, the vocalist of the evening, selected three old German Minnelieder of the sixteenth century and an interesting old Scotch ballad, "The twa sisters o' Binnorie."

ROYAL ARTILLERY BAND CONCERTS.

THE perfect understanding between Cavaliere L. Zavertal and his efficient force was abundantly manifested at Queen's Hall on November 29, when Beethoven's "Leonora" (No. 3) Overture and C minor Symphony formed the first part. Of these works London musical amateurs have of late been treated to several exceedingly good performances, so that the Royal Artillery band exhibited courage in thus challenging comparisons. The issue was highly satisfactory. The most dramatic of operatic preludes was played with all the necessary impulse, and every point in the glorious "No. 5" received such attention that it was difficult to say whether the rendering of the delicious Andante or of the magnificent Finale earned the most approval. The second half of the Concert consisted of a Capriccio Brillante, "Jota Aragonesa," by Glinka; the tasteful "Brautgesang," from Jensen's "Hochzeitsmusik"; the Gavotte from "Mignon," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," and Mr. Edward German's well-constructed Overture to "Richard III.," each given with capital effect.

Beethoven was also conspicuous at the Concert on the 13th ult., the example of the Bonn master on this occasion being the First Symphony. Scrupulous care and watchfulness by all concerned again resulted in a pronounced success—indeed, this initial work in a matchless series has rarely been interpreted with nicer regard for detail. Specially excellent, too, was the rendering of the Overture to "Hänsel und Gretel," of Berlioz's arrangement of Weber's "L'Invitation à la Valse," and of the Prelude to Massenet's "Hérodiade," the latter repeated by general desire. A pleasant introduction was the able conductor's "Rococo, à la Gavotte," a piquant piece of an old-world type that deserved the applause it obtained. The selection further comprised the Overture to "Der Freischütz," the March from Delibés's "Sylvia" Suite, and the No. 5 "Spanische Tänze" of Moszkowski. The attendance at both Concerts was large and fashionable.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAL SOCIETIES' CONCERTS.

THAT admirable Association, the Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral Society, gave its first Subscription Concert for the present season, at the Queen's Hall, on the 3rd ult., under Mr. George Kitchin. Very highly commendable performances were secured of Mendelssohn's Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage"; Haydn's Symphony in D (No. 10 of Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel's edition), a characteristically genial work though very rarely played in this country; and a new "Petite Suite pour Orchestre," by Mr. Richard H. Walthew. It is difficult to understand why such a talented young English composer should use French phraseology in describing his works. It is an affectation that should be discountenanced; but the merits of this five-movement Suite must be freely allowed. Though not ambitious, the music is fresh and tuneful, and the orchestration shows the hand of a skilled musician. The male-voice choir sang glees and part-songs in excellent style; Mrs. Douglas Scott and Miss Emily Shinner played in the most admirable manner Spohr's Concertante in B minor for two violins (Op. 88), and Madame Marian McKenzie, although an apology was made for her on the ground that she was suffering from neuralgia, sang in her best manner airs by Saint-Saëns, Carl Bohm, and Chaminade.

On the following evening the same platform was occupied by the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, which came into prominence now more than twenty years ago, when its meetings were held in the Albert Hall. Mr. George Mount still continues to direct it, and conscientious performances were given at this Concert of Sterndale Bennett's lovely Overture "The Naïads," Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, and especially of a selection from Verdi's tuneful opera "Un Ballo in Maschera." The performance of Mr. E. German's new Suite in D minor was unavoidably postponed, but the work will be given at the second Concert, on February 12 next. Mr. Fritz Masbach played pianoforte solos, and Miss Giulia Ravogli was of course unexceptionable in rather hackneyed solos from "Lucrezia Borgia" and "La Favorita."

The Westminster Orchestral Society happily continues to flourish, and gave its first Concert for the current season at the Westminster Town Hall, on the 11th ult. Mr. Stewart Macpherson's steadily improving forces gave Mozart's rarely played Overture to "Così fan tutti," the same composer's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor (admirably played by Miss Dora Bright, with cadenzas by the executant), and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony in a way that reflected much credit on the executive members of the Society. The first part was made up entirely of Mozart's music, and included the concert aria "Mentre ti lascio," an outcome of the master's early years, and on the present occasion contributed by Mr. Arthur Walenn; and "Batti, batti," which was sung by Miss Lindsay Currie.

MR. WILLIAM NICHOLL'S VOCAL RECITAL.

"Songs of the North" was the title of a programme of Scottish airs that, on the 9th ult., in the Queen's (Small) Hall, had the merit of being, for the most part, unfamiliar to the audience. Patrons of the Concerts that take place in the metropolis on St. Andrew's Day have some cause for complaint that, as a rule, the same songs are annually offered, and that a few of them are not really Scotch. Mr. William Nicholl effectively demonstrated that there are many charming songs of which Southerners have scarcely heard the melodies, much less the words. Accompanying himself on the pianoforte he sang with the truest sentiment the pathetic air "Culloden Muir," "Ca' the yowes to the knowes," and similar pieces, to which, as a telling contrast, he offered the joyous "Jinglin' Johnnie," "Bessie Bell and Mary Gray," and like humorous effusions. He entered into the spirit of each with the fullest success, showing that he was as much master of the gay as of the grave. Mr. Nicholl was assisted by Mrs. Helen Trust, who sang several airs, both homely and romantic, with unerring taste and judgment.

PIANOFORTE AND VIOLIN RECITALS.

The very busy autumn season which is now finished has been especially noteworthy for the number of Pianoforte Recitals by executants of the highest calibre. We can only note in the most succinct manner what has been done during the last few weeks. The first performance that calls for mention was that of Mr. August Stradal, at the Steinway Hall, on November 26, the programme of which consisted of compositions and transcriptions by Liszt, the pianist's former master. The original pieces included "Les Funérailles," the Fifth Rhapsody, and "St. Francis walking on the waves"; and the arrangements, four of Schubert's songs and three studies on themes by Paganini. All these were interpreted with a measure of conscientiousness worthy of that earnest Liszt disciple, the late Walter Bache.

Two Pianoforte Recitals were given by Madame Burmeister Petersen, in the same hall, on November 27 and the 4th ult. In the first programme were Schumann's "Carnaval" and various pieces by Chopin, Rubinstein, and Liszt; and in the second Beethoven's Sonata in D minor (Op. 31, No. 2), pieces by Chopin, Raff, Scarlatti, and Liszt, and some of those transcriptions which pianists evidently think are acceptable at present, such as Bach-Tausig, Schubert-Liszt, and Weber-Kullak. Madame Petersen, who is pianist to the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, has fine technique and may be described as an excellent virtuoso.

That admirable violinist, Miss Irma Sethe, gave her second Violin Recital, in St. James's Hall, on November 29, being assisted by Mr. Reisenauer. An excellent ensemble was secured in Beethoven's Sonata in F for pianoforte and violin (Op. 24) and Grieg's in the same key (Op. 8). Miss Sethe strongly reminded us of her master, Mr. Ysaÿe, by the breadth of her phrasing and strong emotional feeling in pieces by Bach, Ries, and Brahms. She must certainly take rank among the foremost of lady violinists. Mr. Reisenauer gave several pianoforte solos by antiquarian and modern composers with brilliancy, and Mr. Arthur Walenn was commendable in Schubert's Song "Der Wanderer." The third Recital took place on Friday, the 6th ult., the most interesting feature of the programme being a Sonata for violin and pianoforte by the French composer, César Franck. This work, like most of those from the same source, shows more cleverness than inspiration, but it was played in the most effective manner by Miss Sethe and Mr. Reisenauer. Concerning the solos offered by both artists nothing need be said. Enough that both have justifiably established themselves in the favour of the London musical public.

Under the heading of Recitals may come the last Concert this autumn season of Mr. Sarasate and Madame Berthe Goldschmidt, on the 2nd ult., in St. James's Hall. The two artists were heard together in Brahms's first Sonata for pianoforte and violin in G (Op. 78), a beautiful though sombre and reflective work, and in Beethoven's ever welcome "Kreutzer" Sonata. Solos for both instruments by Raff, Chopin, Liszt, and Mr. Sarasate himself completed the scheme, and the huge audience and enthusiastic applause must have convinced Mr. Sarasate and Madame Goldschmidt of the continued esteem in which they are held by amateurs in this metropolis.

The programme of Mr. Alfred Reisenauer's fourth Pianoforte Recital, at St. James's Hall, on the 3rd ult., commenced with some, comparatively speaking, small pieces by Handel and Scarlatti, and concluded with other minor pieces by Weber, Chopin, and Liszt. But between these were placed Beethoven's Variations in C minor and Schubert's favourite "Wanderer" Fantasia (Op. 15). Throughout Mr. Reisenauer played with the utmost brilliancy, and his fondness for what might be termed violent contrasts between fortissimo and pianissimo was especially noticeable in Schubert's work, which the composer himself declared he could not interpret properly, but which to pianists of the present day seems mere child's play.

Mr. Rosenthal gave his third and last Pianoforte Recital for the present, at St. James's Hall, on the 9th ult. The principal features in his programme were Chopin's Sonata in B minor (Op. 58), which seems to be steadily growing in favour, and Schubert's "Wanderer" Fantasia, both works being powerfully played, though to all appearance with consummate ease. A number of pieces on a smaller scale were included in the programme, the composers being Bach, Scarlatti, Chopin, Henselt, and Liszt. The pieces by the two last-named composers were loudly encored, and the general demeanour of the audience was such as to show that Mr. Rosenthal has quickly made his mark in this country.

Miss Esperanza Kisch-Schorr gave a second Pianoforte Recital at the Steinway Hall, on the 10th ult. The young artist was not so nervous as on the previous occasion, and played Beethoven's Sonata in F minor (Op. 57) very conscientiously, as she did two characteristic pieces, for the first time in England, by Tschaïkowsky. These are called respectively November and December, and are very pretty and piquant. The B flat minor Sonata of Chopin, with the rendering of the Funeral March according to Rubinstein's ideas, was repeated, and we say again that it is entirely justifiable, though of course differences of opinion may be admitted. Herr Alfred Gallrein played some violin solos.

Mr. Reisenauer's fifth and last Recital for the present took place on the afternoon of the 18th ult., at St. James's Hall, his programme including one of Liszt's transcriptions of Bach's Organ Works, a Passacaglia by Handel, simple but charming movements from a Suite in the "old style" by Mr. Reisenauer himself, a repetition of Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata, and pieces by Schubert, Schumann, Chopin, and Liszt, all of which were powerfully played, though, of course, in matters of detail it would be permissible to differ from Mr. Reisenauer's reading.

THE MUSICAL GUILD.

THE third Concert of this excellent Society's thirteenth series took place at Kensington Town Hall, on November 26. It is doing no injustice to the other young artists to say that the playing of the clarinet part of Mozart's Quintet in A by Mr. C. Draper was the most prominent feature of its performance, his delicate tone and keen sensibility enabling him to bring out to the full the exquisite grace of the favourite work. Though somewhat rough, the rendering of Brahms's Quintet in F minor (Op. 34) was fairly impressive, notwithstanding that the slightly too rapid tempo adopted precluded the depth of the noble Andante, un poco Adagio, from being realised. Nevertheless, praise is due to Miss W. Holiday and Messrs. Sutcliffe, Ackroyd, and Werge for their spirited playing and, more particularly, to Miss Maggie Moore for the courage which carried her through a trying task at a moment when she was suffering from indisposition so severe as to compel the abandonment of the pianoforte solo set down for her. A distinct success was gained by Miss Helen Buckley, a soprano vocalist possessing a fresh, highly-trained voice, and hailing, we believe, from Chicago. Only occasionally do we meet with intonation so delightfully true as that which marked her singing of Massenet's "Il est doux, il est bon."

The most interesting programme of the season was that of the last Concert, on the 10th ult. After Brahms's concise, genial Pianoforte Trio in C minor (Op. 101), played with great finish and refinement by Miss Annie Fry, Miss Isabella Donkersley, and Mr. Paul Ludwig, Mrs. Hutchinson sang two somewhat erratic, though impressive German songs, by Mr. Emanuel Moór, with her usual fervour. Her other solo was Purcell's remarkable air "Mad Bess," in which Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland accompanied her on his famous harpsichord, a superb instrument by Josephus Kirkman (1798), which is fully described in Mr. Dannreuther's "Ornamentation," Part II. (page 178). This highly interesting and elaborate air, or rather scena, beautifully sung by Mrs. Hutchinson, was so warmly applauded that she had to give an encore, her choice being Purcell's "Fairest Isle," from "King Arthur." The great English composer was further represented, and right worthily, by No. 7 of his Ten Sonatas in four parts for strings and harpsichord, now being edited for the Purcell Society by Professor Stanford, and in course of publication by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. It is a beautiful little work, and, as played by Messrs. Maitland, Bent, Sutcliffe, and Ludwig, it charmed and fascinated the ear and mind as might Mrs. Browning's "melody that floats in a serene air purely." We might continue the quotation and refer to these delightful strains of Purcell's, so old and yet so new, as "Antidotes of medicated music," and wish for more opportunities of enjoying them, especially as a relief during the opera season with its realistic "lyrical dramas." Svendsen's String Octet in A (Op. 3), an interesting but very unequal work, received a spirited and sonorous rendering, Mr. Arthur Bent being the leader. Mr. Howgrave was the pianist, but as we sat in the front row and he seemed to have mistaken the platform of Kensington Town Hall for a certain "largest stage in the world" a little farther West, we were hardly in a position to judge of his performance.

BRITISH CHAMBER MUSIC CONCERTS.

MR. ERNEST FOWLES has presented to his numerous patrons an excellent selection of high-class music by British composers, at his second series of Chamber Concerts, the last of which was given on the 20th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall. At the penultimate performance, which took place on the 6th ult., were played Miss Agnes Zimmermann's clever Sonata in A minor (Op. 21) for pianoforte and violin, originally produced at Mr. Chappell's Popular Concerts in 1886; "Three Romantic Pieces" for violoncello, with pianoforte accompaniment, by Hamish MacCunn; a vigorous Pianoforte Sonata in A (No. 2), by Dr. Hubert Parry; and a Trio in D minor for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by Miss Rosalind F. Ellicott. Justice was done to the merits of these works by Miss Zimmermann, M. Emile Sauret, and Mr. Charles Ould; and variety was forthcoming in some songs sung by Madame Isabel Fassett.

At the last Concert of the season three further additions were made to the list of works brought to a first hearing. These were a String Quartet in C major, in three movements, by G. W. S. Marshall Hall; a Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in A minor, by Alfred Wall; and a Pianoforte Quintet in A, by B. Luard Selby. They are all works of serious aim, though of different degrees of success as regards achievement. We confess to a sense of disappointment with Mr. Hall's Quartet. It opens well with a bright energetic Vivace, but the Largo appassionata strives at "intense" expression without impressing the listener, and the final Allegro molto is fragmentary and unsatisfactory. Mr. Wall's Sonata, which was excellently played by Mr. E. Hopkinson and Mr. E. Fowles, does great credit to the young composer. It displays capabilities sufficiently pronounced to warrant his persevering; it is well written and well sounding music, and when his ideas have grown in depth and individuality, we doubt not that Mr. Wall will produce good work. Mr. Selby's new Quintet is in many respects an important addition to British chamber music, for it charms and interests by its melodic wealth and ingenuity of treatment. It has at least something to say which has not been said in exactly the same way before, and its welcome message is received with pleasure and appreciation. Coming at the end of a long programme wholly consisting of novelties, the work did not perhaps make its full effect; but we are convinced of its fine qualities, and therefore hope for an early chance of renewing its acquaintance. The programme also included Mr. John Francis Barnett's pretty "Home Scenes" for the pianoforte, well played by Mr. E. Fowles, and songs by Gerard F. Cobb and J. Cliffe Forrester.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

SATISFACTORY evidences of the excellent training given to the pupils at the Royal Academy of Music were abundantly forthcoming on the 17th ult., when the students of this Institution gave an Orchestral Concert at the Queen's Hall. An interesting feature of the performance was the production of two orchestral sketches, respectively an Andante in E and an Allegretto con moto in A, by Miss Llewela Davies, whose previous compositions, it will doubtless be remembered, have attracted favourable notice. The sketches are based upon attractive themes, and their development and the scoring show distinct talent and considerable knowledge of pleasing effects. The inclusion of three Concertos in the programme gave it a somewhat formidable appearance, but the capacities of the executants justified the selection. The example in this form by Max Bruch in G minor (Op. 26) served to advantageously display the remarkable abilities as a violinist of Mr. Aldo Antonietti, a young musician who produces an admirable tone from his instrument and shows an intuitive sympathy with the music he interprets that indicates a genuine artistic temperament. Miss Greenhill played the pianoforte in Beethoven's familiar Concerto in G (Op. 58) with intelligence, and a touch which, although somewhat weak, was crisp and pleasant to hear. Miss Stibbs also rendered with taste and brilliancy the solo portion of Schumann's Concert Allegro (Op. 134), and Saint-Saëns's Concerto in B minor (Op. 61) afforded Miss Edith E. Byford good opportunities to show the skill she has acquired over her chosen instrument. Pardonable nervousness was doubtless the cause of the persistent tremolo which marred the otherwise pleasurable singing of Miss McCulloch, and Miss S. A. Gomersall's fresh and well-trained voice battled bravely and with considerable success with the exacting requirements of "Hear ye, Israel," from the "Elijah." Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted with his usual watchfulness, and secured some excellent effects from a large orchestra, chiefly composed of students.

The following competitions have taken place during the past month. On the 7th ult. the Sainton Dolby Prize was awarded to Amy Sargent, and the examiners highly commended Sarah A. Gomersall, Clara Williams, and May John. Miss Sargent is a native of London. On the same day the Heathcote Long Prize was awarded to Claude Frederic Pollard (Nottingham).

On the 9th ult. the Bonamy Dobree Prize was awarded to Audrey E. Chapman, and the examiners highly commended Dezso Kordy and Alfred H. Earnshaw. Miss Chapman is a native of Roehampton.

On the 12th ult. the Rutson Memorial Prizes (for contraltos and basses) were awarded—that for contraltos to Mary A. Howard (commended, Lydia Care and Rose Dafforne); and that for basses to Frederick R. Ranalow (commended, William Price). Miss Howard is a native of Stroud, Gloucestershire, and Mr. Ranalow of Kingstown, Ireland.

On the 16th ult. the Robert Cocks Prize was awarded to Lily West. The examiners highly commended Alicia A. Needham, Edith Pratt, and Bessie M. Stibbs. Miss West is a native of London.

On the 19th ult. the Westmorland Scholarship (for vocalists) was awarded to Lilian Coomber; the Lady Jenkinson's Thalberg Scholarship (for pianists) to Claude Frederic Pollard; the Potter Exhibition (for pianists) to Josef C. Holbrook; the Hine Exhibition (for composers) to Harriett Claiborne Dixon. For the last, the examiners commended Elizabeth D. Nicholl.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

At the Chamber Concert given on the 4th ult., Brahms's B flat String Quartet (Op. 67), one of the least popular, though, as regards at least three of its movements, one of the most beautiful of this master's works, was well played by four scholars. Amongst them were two more members of the clever Grimson family—viz., Samuel (violin) and Robert (violoncello)—while Thomas Jeavans and Edward Behr completed the quartet. Miss Marguerite Bennett sang Mendelssohn's "Die Liebende schreibt" and Schumann's matchless "Widmung" with a clear, tuneful voice, but in a coldly correct style ill-suited to lyrics of such deep feeling. Misses Mabel Bond, Edith Tebbutt, and Mildred O'Connell were heard to advantage in a lengthy vocal trio, "Die Grazien," by W. de Haan, a tedious effusion in which the "linkèd sweetness long drawn out" is too cloying for words. Mr. William Ackroyd played Moszkowski's Violin Ballade in G with a good deal of passion, while Miss Marie Motto and Mr. Howard Hadley did ample justice to Schütt's clever Suite for violin and pianoforte, the gifted young lady deserving special mention for her spirited performance. The final Concert of the term, on the 9th ult., was, as usual, orchestral, and included Brahms's Third Symphony in F and his "Schicksalslied," which received fair, though somewhat colourless and soporific interpretations, the Allegros in both noble works being given at an unusually slow rate of speed. Vieuxtemps's Fifth Violin Concerto (Op. 37) was played by Mr. Samuel Grimson, whose remarkably developed technique, full, pure tone, and fearless confidence promise great things for his future. He is certainly the best violinist of his years we have ever heard at the College. A new Pianoforte Concerto by a scholar—William Hurlstone—shows talent, though no individuality such as we find in rare abundance in the works of that most gifted of College scholars, S. Coleridge-Taylor. Mr. Hurlstone seems to have taken Saint-Säens's Second (G minor) Concerto for his model as regards the arrangement of the movements, for, like him, he opens with an Andante, followed by a Scherzo (Allegro molto e con fuoco) and another Allegro, prefaced by a short Adagio. A peculiarity of the work is the last-named Adagio, a sort of Fantasia for the solo instrument with hardly any accompaniment. His ideas are those of a pupil, but the good work displayed in the melodious, strongly rhythmical Scherzo and the bright, rollicking Finale, deserve hearty commendation. Miss Morfydd Williams sang the air "O my heart is weary," from the late Goring Thomas's "Nadeshda," with expression and clear enunciation of the words. Professor Stanford conducted.

The gold medal annually presented by Messrs. J. and J. Hopkinson, for pianoforte playing, was competed for on the 11th ult., before the director and board of professors, and was awarded to E. Howard Jones (scholar).

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

The performance at Queen's Hall, on the 5th ult., of "Elijah," by the students of the prosperous establishment on the Embankment, was distinctly creditable alike to the soloists, the chorus, and the band, the entire force of executants being drawn from the school, with the exception of a few of the instrumentalists. To give opportunity to as many of the more promising students as possible, the solo parts had no less than fifteen representatives. Of these Miss Maude Ballard in "Hear ye, Israel," Miss Maud Robertson in "O rest in the Lord," Mr. Tom Powley as the Prophet in the first part, Miss Florence Oliver, Miss Evelyn Ogle, Miss Laura Pearson, Mr. Ernest Burry, and Mr. Leland Langley particularly justified the confidence reposed in them. The choruses were given with firmness, and, where needed, with dramatic emphasis, whilst neglect of more refined expression was seldom apparent. Earnestness combined with care marked the efforts of the choir throughout. The band was of corresponding ability. Altogether Sir Joseph Barnby, who conducted with his wonted decision and self-possession, had reason to be proud of the numerous body under his control.

"IVANHOE" IN BERLIN.

Sainte Beuve's famous theory that the critic is only "a secretary, who writes what the public thinks," evidently does not hold good in Berlin, for while the press has been mainly hostile to Sir Arthur's work, the public has shown itself sympathetic and appreciative to an unexpected degree. The long-deferred production of "Ivanhoe" took place on November 26, before a large and brilliant audience, which included the Emperor and Empress, the Imperial Chancellor, and a host of social and diplomatic notabilities. The following was the cast: King Richard, Herr Stammer; Prince John, Herr Fränkel; Wilfred of Ivanhoe, Herr Sylva; Friar Tuck, Herr Krolop; The Templar, Herr Bultz; Isaac, Herr Krasa; Rowena, Fräulein Weitz; Rebecca, Fräulein Hiedler; and Ulrica, Fräulein Goetze. The production had been twice postponed on account of the illness of the two prime donne, but the contretemps was productive of the luckiest results, for a reason that English readers will not peruse without a smile. The gentleman on whom devolved the duty of providing suitable costumes had been carefully furnished with the designs used in London, but disregarding these he had, with true Teutonic independence, evolved an entirely new set of dresses "from his inner consciousness." The effect of these on Sir Arthur Sullivan at the first dress rehearsal is not to be described in language suitable for The Musical Times. Thanks, however, to the energy and courtesy of Count Hochberg and his able assistant, Mr. Pierson, the opera was eventually re-costumed according to the original designs. The expense of this (from an artistic point of view necessary) alteration furnished hostile critics with abundant material for clamour, and much cheap indignation was expressed at the undue favour shown to a foreigner by expenditure far in excess of that usual with native composers. The performance itself was excellent, and we have the best authority for stating that Sir Arthur was delighted, not only with the principal artists, but also with the splendid orchestra and its able chief, Dr. Muck. The revised version of the opera was used, but no special alterations were made for Berlin. Some of the most enthusiastic applause was bestowed upon the air of the King, the duet between the Templar and Rebecca in the second act, and other numbers, Friar Tuck's song proving, as a matter of course, a special source of delight. Amongst the leading artists, the palm must be awarded to Fräulein Heidler, whose realisation of the fascinating part of the heroine elicited universal admiration. Sir Arthur, who, with Count von Hochberg, the director of the Royal Theatre, occupied a stage box, was called before the curtain at the end of the second and third acts, as well as at the conclusion of the opera, and also received the personal felicitations of the Emperor, who had followed the performance with the closest interest. Since the first performance some half-dozen others have been given—each time to fuller houses; and it is probable that "Ivanhoe" will go the round of the German theatres, Dresden and other centres having already made enquiries.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

At the monthly Meeting of the Musical Association, which took place on the 10th ult., at the Royal College of Organists, Mr. T. L. Southgate, in a paper, "On the treatment of music by novelists," drew attention to a matter which in these days of musical culture distinctly calls for amendment. Mr. Southgate said truly that many of the best known novelists in their references to music displayed an ignorance of the art which indicated that they held it in light esteem or else that they were utterly incapable of realising the ridiculous nature of their statements. In "A Roman Singer," by Marian Crawford, there was a violinist who could sustain the common chord of A minor, while at the same time "he imitated the sounds of a laughing voice high up above the monotonous chord; softly at first as though far in the distance; then louder and nearer, the sustaining notes of the minor falling away one after the other and losing themselves." The hero was prepared for his operatic début by partaking of "blackberry syrup" in order to increase his courage. However, "his voice spoke like a clarion call on the day of judgment in its wrath and murmured more plaintively and sadly in sorrow than ever the poor Peri sighed at the gates of Paradise." Then we were told that in "'Salve dimora' is a point when the music goes away to the highest note that any one can possibly sing." It was easy for this hero, but all other tenors made it sound like "the squeak of a dying pig." "The Dominant Seventh," by Kate E. Clark, related some terrible effects produced by this harmony, especially when it was "woven together by pathetic chords rolled out in one shining web of melody . . . a mingling of strains from the great composers." George Meredith informed us that the drum was an instrument that "gives vast internal satisfaction owing to its corpulency." William Black spoke of "a perfect accord of descending fifths" as a most enjoyable and wonderful passage; and in "Kilmeny" the hero wonders if Miss Lesley "would only express a faint surprise at hearing Mozart's Sonata in A sharp!" In George Eliot's "Daniel Deronda," a lady resumes conversation "after a long organ stop," and the nervous system of the heroine of "Mr. Barnes of New York" "is kept at a constant unrelaxing tension that makes it like the C string of a highly tuned violin."

There was, however, a more serious side to this subject, for some writers, assuming a knowledge they did not possess, described the effects of music in a manner that was calculated to prove prejudicial to the art. A flagrant example of this was Count Tolstoi's novel, "The Kreutzer Sonata," a name apparently adopted to attract the attention of those who esteemed this masterpiece of Beethoven, for the story had little to do with music, the references to which could only be described as a foul libel on a pure art. Absolute music per se could not suggest evil thoughts or inspire a crime. Marie Corelli's "Sorrows of Satan" contained similar untrue and objectionable insinuations; thus a long and extravant description of a performance concluded as follows: "My breath failed me, my senses swam; I felt that I must move, speak, cry out, and implore that this music, this horribly insiduous music, should cease ere I swooned with the voluptuous poison of it." Later on we were told about a song concerning "A secret closely hid beneath the coffin lid," which "sent Lady Elton into the throes of a violent convulsion, and which caused her eyes to roll in their sockets like balls of glass." Du Maurier's "Trilby" presented many problems to the musician. We were informed that the heroine of the beautiful feet was "absolutely tone deaf and without ear," yet she sang "the only song she had heard her father sing, 'Ben Bolt,' in a volume of breathy sound not loud, but immense." As yet we hardly knew the possibilities of hypnotism, but it could not alter physical conditions, and on these depended the quality of the voice, likewise the delicate appreciation of sounds. Moreover, the improved Trilby could never have forgotten her three years of training, as we were asked to believe, upon the withdrawal of the hypnotic influence. Again, "everything that Paganini could do with his violin she did with her voice—only better." Could she sing two notes at once? Trilby also sings an Impromptu in A flat, by Chopin, "sans paroles," which we are told "finally dies away like the afterglow of fading Bengal fires, ending pianissimo in E in alt!" Then there was the description of a contralto voice, "the deep low voice that breaks and changes in the middle and soars all at once into a magnified angelic boy treble." This "strange voice seems to pierce the heart and stir the very vitals," particularly when the lady sang "in the middle of the note." In conclusion, the lecturer suggested that novelists should submit their remarks on music to some trained musician.

Owing to the length of the paper there was no time for discussion, but Professor Bridge, who occupied the chair, expressed his indignation that music should be treated in so unworthy and contemptuous a manner by writers who should certainly know better, and Mr. F. Gilbert Webb quoted a passage from "Signa," by Ouida, who, referring to the broken violin of the hero, informed the reader that "The wooden shell he could piece together well enough; but the keys were smashed beyond all chance of restoration."

THE HISTORY OF ENGLISH MUSIC.

Mr. Fuller Maitland's fifth Lecture at the Baker Street Church of England High School for Girls, on November 27, had for its title, "Arne, and the eighteenth century composers." The lecturer pointed out that at the time of Purcell's death the prospects of English music were brighter than they had ever been before. Englishmen took a real pride in their greatest composer, and for many years after his death his music retained its hold upon them. Croft and other composers seemed likely to carry on the good work, but it was put to a sudden stop by the advent of Handel, who was the first to bring Italian opera into fashion in this country. From the beginning of the eighteenth century the fashionable public systematically decried and neglected indigenous musical talent and worshipped foreign celebrities. Handel availed himself freely of the works of Purcell, and many of his characteristic choral effects were due to the British master, who, of course, got no credit at all for them. The lecturer went on to describe the excellent work done by Dr. Greene (born just about the time that Purcell died), Dr. Boyce, who succeeded Greene as Master of the King's Band; Dr. Arne, and Dr. Nares, whose instrumental pieces were spoken of as resembling Bach's rather than Handel's. The catch or round was next dealt with as one of the purely English forms least affected by foreign influence, and then the most celebrated glee composers received attention. The Lecture concluded with a lucid summary of the excellent work done by the Wesleys, especially in making known to English music-lovers the music of John Sebastian Bach. The illustrations included vocal pieces sung by Mrs. Helen Trust, and "lessons" and sonatas by various composers played on the harpsichord by Mr. Maitland.

The last Lecture, given on the 4th ult., dealt with nineteenth century composers. The lecturer drew an interesting parallel between the influence on English composers of Handel in the eighteenth and Mendelssohn in the nineteenth century, but said that the latter had been less crushing. Sterndale Bennett's indebtedness to Mendelssohn had been exaggerated — his works contained individual ideas and modes of expression. The influence of Mendelssohn's style, however, was so great, that for a time it quite destroyed the individualities of smaller men. A warm tribute of praise was given to Loder, Pearson, G. A. Macfarren, Henry Smart, F. E. Bache, and Goss. The living composers dealt with were Sullivan, Stanford, Goring Thomas, Mackenzie, Parry, Corder, Cowen, Somervell, C. H. Lloyd, and several others. The illustrations included songs, excellently sung by Mrs. Hutchinson and Miss G. Sichel, and several instrumental pieces.

LONDON INSTITUTION.

Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch gave a most entertaining and instructive Lecture, on the 5th ult., at the London Institution. Surrounded by some very fine specimens of old instruments, the lecturer passed from one to the other, explaining the construction and peculiarities of each with the directness of perfect acquaintance and the prejudice of affection. Taking up the historical lute around which so many romantic stories cling, the lecturer said that for 300 years this instrument held the place in the household now occupied by the pianoforte. Children had to learn it as now they have to practise upon the keyboard, and "probably did not succeed any better, for it was a difficult instrument." The backsliding character of the lute to get out of tune was not mentioned, but according to an ancient authority, if a man played the lute for eighty years he would have spent sixty of them in manipulating the numerous pegs round which the strings were entwined in slippery embrace. Considerable attention was bestowed upon the family of viols, with and without sympathetic strings, those furnished with the latter being kept for solos, as the added strings somewhat blurred the attack. Several pieces were played on these instruments, those rendered by Miss Hélène Dolmetsch on a viola da gamba deservedly calling forth hearty applause. Most interest was, however, perhaps manifested in a fine toned virginal, dated Venice, 1550, upon which was played some of the music contained in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, now being published for the first time under the editorship of Mr. Fuller Maitland and Mr. Barclay Squire. The ingenious devices by which distinct varieties of timbre were procurable from the double harpsichord were explained as proceeding from two and sometimes three sets of strings, which were severally plucked by quills and leather, according to the stops used. In the instrument exhibited there were five speaking stops, which severally acted upon quill-plucked strings, leather-plucked strings, and partially damped strings, giving a harp-like effect; while the employment of the others produced a trumpet tone and a peculiar bright silvery tone resulting from the strings being plucked close to the nut. Other varieties of tone-colour could of course be produced by certain combinations. The modern pianoforte was thus shown not to be wholly a gain; but notwithstanding the advantages possessed by the harpsichord, the ear undoubtedly grows more quickly wearied with the sharp and persistent "ting" of the plucked string than it does of the sameness of tone produced by the blow of the felt-covered hammer. Much interest was evinced in a new clavichord made by Mr. Dolmetsch after the old models. In this instrument a tangent makes the note before it is struck, in a similar manner as a player stops the strings of the violin. The strings also were struck in such a way that a slight swelling forth of the sound could be produced by pressure of the finger on the note after it was struck, or, if desired, a tremolo effect. This made the instrument very sympathetic, and was doubtless the reason why it was preferred by Bach to the harpsichord. But the tone produced was so weak that, as Miss Dolmetsch played the Prelude and Fugue from Bach's famous "Forty-eight," the sweet low plaintive tones seemed like the ghostly voices of far away ages.

IRISH LITERARY SOCIETY.

Under the presidency of Dr. Charles Wood, a Meeting of the Irish Literary Society was held on November 30 at the Society of Arts, at which a comprehensive paper was read by Dr. Annie W. Patterson. The lecturer began by impressing on her audience the great gulf that existed between ancient and modern music, created by the intervals of the present scale. It was now only possible to convey a comparatively tuneless version of music which had been described as powerful to elicit tears and smiles. Speaking generally, and allowing for climatic and other influences, a certain amount of preliminary education was required before we could appreciate modern music, especially in its advanced form; whereas the nature of ancient music was presumably such as would appeal directly to the inborn perception of the human ear, independent of preconceived ideas. Ancient melodies were composed in what has been termed "nature's scale," and modern science obliged us to translate them into a scale which could only be in justice to truth described as artificial. Yet the beauty of the old Irish folk-songs was such that its spirit appealed to us even though thus disguised. Irish music, indeed, never fell powerless on the hearing ear, nor spoke in vain to the sympathetic heart. Irish chroniclists described some six mystic cycles or ages of colonisation, the last two on the list being those of the Tuatha dé Danaan and the Milesians. The former people were said to have come from Greece and to have been skilled in magic and scientific knowledge of all kinds. It was in connection with this mysterious race that there was found in an ancient Irish MS. the story of the Daghda and his magic harp, which contained the first mention in Gaelic writings of the harp or cruith. The last band of invaders who colonised Ireland in the mythical period was that of the Milesians. These succeeded in completely subduing and supplanting the Tuatha dé Danaan, whom subsequent tradition represented as dwindling down into fairies and taking up their abode in the mountains and about the lonely lakes of the country. The Milesians would seem to have come to Ireland by way of Spain from the East. They were well skilled in music and poetry, and the results of researches indicated that they had acquired their knowledge from Egyptian science. The lecturer (aided by magic lantern images) compared the most ancient drawings of Irish harps, as found engraved on stone, &c., with the instruments depicted in the tombs of the Egyptians, the result confirming the theory of the origin of the Irish harp being Eastern. Study of these ancient harps inclined the lecturer to believe that the instrument originated, or at least was highly developed by the Egyptians, that the front pillar was an additon by the Hebrews or some kindred people who were at one time more or less influenced by Egyptian art and custom, that the ancient Milesians or Gadelians came from the East, and, judging by their code of laws and the Semitic character of their names, were of Hebraic origin.

Reference was made to the exalted position held by the Bards among the Celtic people from the remotest period, and to the Council convened at Drumkill, in County Donegal, by the reigning king of Ireland in 558, to obtain their expulsion, which, however, did not take place. The decline of Irish harp playing was ascribed to 1738, after which period the prevalence of equal temperament and the preference of the art patrons of Great Britain and Ireland for continental music rang the death knell of the ancient harpers. Only seven of these responded to the generous offers of James Dungan, in 1781, who endeavoured to revive the annual meeting of harpers, but had to relinquish it after three years. Denis Hempson, the veteran harper of Magilligan, County Londonderry, who lived to the age of 112, might be regarded as the last of the race of minstrels who were versed in the correct traditions of the ancient school of Irish harp playing. He was the only harpist at the Belfast meeting in 1792 who played with long crooked nails as described by the old writers. In playing he caught the string between the flesh and the nail. He had an admirable manner of playing staccato and legato, his fingers lying over the strings in such a manner that when he struck them with one finger another was instantly ready to stop the vibration. Speaking of the Irish language, the lecturer said that the musical terms in reference to the harp were legion, and a notable point about them was that they had evidently been invented independently of our modern Italian vocabulary—as, for instance, the word for the shake, which literally meant "activity of the fingers." The lecturer considered the praises of Irish music by Cambrensis, the learned Bishop of St. David's, a great proof of the remarkable skill of the bards, since Cambrensis was of Welsh and Flemish descent and hated the Irish people.

A most interesting and charming selection of ancient Irish songs was effectively sung by the Misses Mabel Berrey, Florence Shee, Lucy Etheridge, Harriet Rose-Byrne, and Messrs. Walter Mackway and William Webster. Madame Fortescue played the harp, and the lecturer and Mrs. Adelaide Needham presided at the pianoforte.

REVIEWS.

Bible Stories. Musically illustrated in six Sonatas for the Harpsichord. By Johann Kuhnau. No. 1, David and Goliath; No. 2, Saul and David. Edited by J. S. Shedlock. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

KUHNAU, John Sebastian Bach's predecessor at St. Thomas's, Leipzig, published the "Biblical Sonatas" in that city in 1700. He was then, though only thirty-three, at the zenith of his fame. Considering that Kuhnau was the greatest German composer of music for the clavier before Bach, it is strange that no complete edition of his works has yet been issued. A few selected pieces have found their way into modern collections, but that is all, and the Bible Sonatas, so often mentioned in biographical articles and histories of music have, until now, remained available only to those who had access to the original edition, copies of which are so scarce that even the British Museum does not possess one. The thanks of music-lovers all the world over are therefore due to the editor and publishers of what we hope will prove to be only a first instalment of this most interesting set of Sonatas. They have placed within easy reach of everyone music that forms an important link in the chain of musical progress, and which no student of that progress can afford to ignore. Quite apart from the consideration that these pieces were written when Bach and Handel were only fifteen years of age, the fact that they are the earliest examples that have come down to us of Programme music, in which the true function of the art is kept in view, gives them an altogether unique position in instrumental music. There were battle pieces, bird pieces, and feeble attempts to imitate storms before Kuhnau's time, as every musician knows; but here for the first time we have a serious attempt to illustrate dramatic incidents by means of instrumental music that aims at expressing, not the incidents themselves (which, of course, would be impossible), but their characteristics and emotional causes and results. Thus, in the first Sonata, the composer himself thus describes his intentions: "1. The stamping and defying of Goliath. 2. The terror of the Israelites and their prayer to God at sight of the terrible enemy. 3. The courage of David, his desire to humble the pride of the giant, and his childlike trust in God. 4. The contest of words between David and Goliath and the combat itself in which Goliath is wounded in the forehead by a stone, so that he falls to the ground and is slain. 5. The flight of the Philistines. 6. The exultation of the Israelites over their victory. 7. The praise of David sung by the women in alternate choirs; and, finally, 8, the general joy expressing itself in hearty dancing and leaping." The second Sonata is more subjective. The various movements deal with "1. The sadness and madness of King Saul. 2. The refreshing song (sic) of David's harp. 3. The tranquil and contented mind of Saul." All these things are expressed with a mastery and decision of touch, a directness and felicity of phrase, and a dignity and purity of style that command instant admiration; but, beyond this, the music is throughout full of charm for the ear. "Realistic" effects are almost entirely absent, and "meaning" is never obtained at the sacrifice of musical beauty. Of the two Sonatas (they are published together) the first has more variety and would probably appeal to a wider circle of hearers than the second, which is deeper, and more likely to interest musicians. The former may also be recommended to organists as eminently suited to their instrument—the more so that, in the original edition, a hint to this effect is given by the composer himself.

Calisthenics for the Pianoforte. By E. Silas. [Edwin Ashdown.]

THE title of this collection is somewhat alarming and suggests distraction of neighbours and destruction of the household instrument. In a brief preface the author says: "There is no dearth of good exercises for the pianoforte, but for the most part they all more or less repeat each other. In the following pages I have tried to leave the ordinary track, and many of the passages will be found of unusual difficulty, written in the belief that when a player can master these, passages of ordinary difficulty will appear comparatively easy." Executants therefore who rejoice in technical feats may be attracted to this collection. Inasmuch, however, as in twenty-one out of the twenty-seven exercises the left hand faithfully follows in similar motion the arpeggios played by the right, the difficulties treated of cannot be said to be very comprehensive.

Cantilène. Legende Espagnole. For Violoncello, with Pianoforte Accompaniment. By Arthur Hervey. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE first of these pieces belongs to the class of music which charms by its unaffected and spontaneous expression and which appeals to the cultured musician by its refinement and finished craftsmanship. The "Cantilène" presents no difficulties to the average violoncellist, and will doubtless enhance the enjoyment of many evenings at home at this season.

The "Legende" is more ambitious in design and character, but it demands no special executive abilities. In pieces bearing this title one looks for the suggestion of the mysterious, and, in this instance, for the courteousness which we are told existed before "Cervantes smiled Spain's chivalry away." These requirements are found in Mr. Hervey's music, which thus possesses much that is attractive. In both pieces the unconventional nature of the harmonic progressions in the final cadences will prove interesting to musicians.

Three Romances for Pianoforte. Op. 33. By Herbert S. Oakeley. [Schott and Co.]

THE first of these romances is headed "The course of true love never did run smooth," a quotation which some amateurs may think appropriately illustrated by the piece being written in six sharps. It starts in a calm and expressive manner, and although it gets into difficulties on the second page and does not get out of them for a considerable space it ends tranquilly, and leaves a satisfactory impression. No. 2 informs the player that "In the Spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love," and the music, if expressively played, will induce the listener to think that it is good that a man's thoughts should so stray. The piece, which may be described as a song without words, is developed at some length and is the most important of the three compositions. With No. 3 we are introduced to "The time of roses," which effectively concludes a melodious and musician-like series.

Nocturne and Pavane, from "Romeo and Juliet." For Pianoforte solo. By Edward German.

Pastorale, from "Romeo and Juliet." For Violin and Pianoforte. By Edward German. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

CULTURED pianists who have seen the version of Shakespeare's immortal love story now being performed at the Lyceum Theatre will without doubt welcome the arrangements for their instrument of the charming "Nocturne" which, it will be remembered, ushers in the third act, and the graceful "Pavane," which is danced with courtly gestures in the brilliant ball-room scene. Although the spell of the delicate orchestration is of course lost in the keyboard version, the spirit of the music remains, and a sympathetic executant cannot fail to experience and give pleasure as he or she converts the silent notes into sweetest sounds. There is but little difficulty in doing this, for the music is easy to read and calls more upon the heart than the head for its due interpretation. The suave character of the opening pages of the Nocturne is effectively interrupted by the triplets introduced in the bass as the music grows more impassioned and suggestive of the avowal in the balcony scene. This middle portion also provides an admirable contrast to the resumption of the first theme with which the piece ends "as breezes pause, and die."

The Pavane being in A minor might be played with excellent effect immediately after the Nocturne, which is in A major. How to play this Pavane will be best learned by a visit to the Lyceum, where it is danced. Mr. German would seem to have had a previous existence upon this earth when old English dances were "righte merrily" footed all over the land. Only by such an hypothesis can his remarkable ability to reproduce the very essence of the dance measures of our forefathers be satisfactorily accounted for. The dances written for the production of "Henry VIII." have been heard far and wide, and the same irresistible rhythm and quaint old-world charm that have secured them such extraordinary popularity distinguish this "Pavane," which, in its dainty refinement and courtly air, seems to resuscitate the "good old" days.

The Pastorale was written to precede the second act, for the incidents in which it admirably prepared the mind. The arrangement for the violin and pianoforte preserves many of the charms of the original orchestral version, and the interest of the music is well shared between the instruments. As in the Nocturne, contrast is obtained by an animated middle episode, and the Finale is remarkably effective without presenting any notable difficulty. These pieces may be warmly recommended to all amateurs, for they will enable them to "discourse most eloquent music."

Ricordi's Lyric Album. Vols. I. and II. [Ricordi and Co.]

Volume I. consists of six songs by Signor Paolo Tosti, and includes "Help me to pray," "Non me lo dite" ("Tell me not that"), "Lungi" ("Far away"), "We have loved," "Dopo" ("Ever since"), and "Rosa." All these are more or less well known to vocalists, and to not a few the present issue will be doubtless welcome. Volume II. comprises half-a-dozen examples of the vocal compositions of Signor Luigi Caracciolo. They are "My heart and I," "Yes, I like you," "Stars of the summer night," "Why should we part," "A muleteer song," and "For thee." If less popular than the collection by Signor Tosti, amateurs have fairly well appraised the value of these songs. They are unpretentious and presumably meet the requirements of some singers.

Seven Children's Songs. With Pianoforte Accompaniment. Op. 61. By Edvard Grieg. With the original Norwegian words and an English version by Lady Macfarren. [Augener and Co.]

These songs are delightfully fresh and characteristic. Although well suited to young folks of musical abilities, several of them might be made effective by children of larger growth. The English translation is not always as happy as it might be. Such lines as "'Mid glow and glimmer and children's glee, 'bove fruits and flags shines a bright star golden," give the vocalist little chance to produce a good tone, even after their meaning has been grasped. The accompaniments are models of simplicity and effectiveness.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Amsterdam.—M. Eduard Zeldenrust, favourably known to London audiences, was the pianist at the first Philharmonic Concert of the season, and was greatly applauded in pieces by Schumann, Jensen, and others.

Berlin.—At a Concert at the Opera, given on November 30, under the direction of Herr Weingartner, the first performance was included of a new Requiem (manuscript) by the composer of "Donna Diana," Herr von Reznicek.——Amongst recent Concert-givers should be mentioned Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, who gave a most successful Pianoforte Recital at the Bechstein Hall; and a young violinist, Signor Arrigo Serato, of Bologna.——A new Choral Symphony by Herr Mahler, who some few years since conducted German Opera at Drury Lane Theatre, is about to be produced at the Philharmonic Concerts here, under Professor Gernsheim's direction.——A cycle of Wagner's works was commenced at the Royal Opera, on the 6th ult., with a performance of "Rienzi."

Bologna.—The new opera "Consuelo," the libretto founded upon George Sand's novel, which gained for its composer, Signor Giacomo Orefice, the Baruzzi Prize of 5,000 lire, was brought out here recently, for the first time, with great success.

Brunswick.—A new work by Herr Eduard Kremser, for male chorus, solo voices, and orchestra, entitled "Balkan Bilder," in which the composer has skilfully interwoven some popular Bulgarian melodies, has just been performed here with much success. The work is also to be shortly produced at Munich, Stuttgart, and Zurich.

Brussels.—A new Mass for five voices unaccompanied, by M. Edgard Tinel, the composer of "Franciscus," was performed last month at the Church of St. Boniface and created a most favourable impression. The performances also included a charming "Ave Maria" from the same pen.——Signor Ferrucio Busoni, the eminent pianist, took part in M. Joseph Dupont's first Symphony Concert of the season, last month, and also gave a Recital of his own.——The réprise, on the 7th ult., at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, of "Fidelio" was the first important event of the season here. This sublime work, which had not been given since 1889, was performed with the recitatives so ably added by M. Gevaert, who also superintended the rehearsals. Madame Georgette Leblanc proved an admirable exponent of the heroic wife, and M. Casset was the Florestan.

Cologne.—An interesting addition to Concert enterprise in this town is the formation of a quintet party of wind instruments, consisting of Herren Wehsener (flute), Exner (oboe), Friede (clarinet), Sadony (bassoon), and Tornauer (horn), all leading members of the Gürzenich Orchestra. The new association will give three Concerts of chamber music, with or without pianoforte, during the season.——A new opera, entitled "Sjula," by the Dresden composer, Herr von Kaskel, has just been brought out at the Stadt-Theater and exceedingly well received.

Crefeld.—Fräulein Josepha Joachim, the second daughter of the eminent violinist, is about to make her début here in Schiller's "Jungfrau von Orleans," the young lady having adopted the stage as a profession. Her elder sister, Marie, is an esteemed member of the Opera in Dessau.

Darmstadt.—Reznicek's comic opera "Donna Diana" was brought out here last month at the Grand-ducal Theatre, under Herr de Haan's direction, with great success. The notable work by the Austrian composer is now making the round of German lyrical stages.

Dresden.—Herr E. d'Albert's new opera "Ghismonda," the libretto (based upon a dramatic poem by Immermann) from the pen of the composer, was brought out at the Royal Theatre on November 28, under Herr Schuch's direction, and was received with much apparent favour by a numerous audience, whose verdict was not, however, altogether shared by the local press. On the repetition of the performance the house was half empty.

Frankfort-on-Main.—An interesting historical Concert in honour of lady composers was given here recently, under the auspices of the Society of German Women. The programme included a poem by Goethe, set to music by the Duchess Anna Amelia of Saxe-Weimar, a niece of Frederick the Great, who died early in the century. There were also performed a song by Corona Schroeter, who flourished in the second half of the eighteenth century; two pianoforte pieces by Fanny Hensel, Mendelssohn's gifted sister; a song by the last century composer, Louise Reichardt; pianoforte pieces by Madame Schumann; and finally a selection from Frau Ingeborg von Bronsart's opera "Hiarne," which has already been successfully produced at Gotha and Weimar.

Hanover.—The Royal Theatre here, which has been closed for some time past pending important structural alterations, has just been re-opened with a gala performance of "Fidelio." The house presented a greatly improved appearance.

Leipzig.—The recently discovered remains of Johann Sebastian Bach are shortly to be transferred to their new resting-place in the renovated church of St. John's, by the side of that of the poet Gellert. The suggestion made from several quarters that the remains of the great Cantor should be placed in St. Thomas's Church, so closely associated with his artistic activity, has, it would seem, not found favour with the authorities.——An event in musical circles here was the first performance, at the eighth Gewandhaus Concert last month, of Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust," the productions of that master, with others of the modern schools, having been all but excluded here under the former régime. The performance was an excellent one, under Herr Nikisch's bâton, the soloists being Mdlle. Marcella Pregi, of Paris; Herren Schelper, Bandrowski, and Krüpfer.

MAYENCE.—Ibsen's early romantic drama, "The Feast of Solhang," with the new incidental music by Herr Hans Pfitzner, was produced for the first time at the Stadt-Theater last month. The drama, which is in style widely apart from the author's later manner, was received with much interest, while the musical numbers proved a most valuable adjunct to the general effect. Herr Humperdinck, writing in the Frankfurter Zeitung, speaks in terms of high praise of Herr Pfitzner's score, which includes solo and choral numbers and three particularly effective orchestral preludes. The composer, who conducted, was repeatedly recalled.

MUNICH.—The ever active management of the Royal Opera, which some time since earned the gratitude of Mozart lovers by a model performance of "Le Nozze di Figaro," is now actively preparing a similar representation of "Don Giovanni." The immortal work is to be produced in exact accordance with the original score used by the master himself (in the possession of Madame Viardot Garcia) and divided into two acts as indicated by the librettist. In order to effect the scenic changes more rapidly, a revolving stage is being constructed, by means of which the changes will be carried out in a few seconds before the eyes of the audience.——After some unavoidable delay, Herr Richard Strauss's new opera "Guntram" has been at length brought out at the Royal Theatre. During the rehearsing of the work some rather energetic protests were raised on the part of some of the leading vocalists, one of whom (himself the composer of an opera) even going so far as to question whether his part contained anything which might be justly described as "music." However, Herr Strauss's new work, which is undoubtedly an important one, containing many fine scenes, was extremely well received by the audience. The press, as might have been expected, is very much divided in its opinion.——Sir Arthur Sullivan's operetta "The Chieftain" is just now being performed for the first time in Germany, at the Gärtnerplatz Theatre here, with good success.

PESARO.—Mascagni has been duly installed in his new office as director of the Liceo Rossini, amidst numerous public demonstrations testifying to the popularity of his appointment. The professors of the Institution are said to have been greatly struck with the familiarity displayed by the young Maëstro with every detail of the various branches of instruction. He is said, moreover, to have intimated that he will not produce any new operatic work for some years to come, but devote himself meanwhile to teaching.

PRAGUE.—Under the title of "Perniková Chaloupka" (The Gingerbread Cottage), Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" was produced for the first time in Czech, at the National Theatre, on the 3rd ult.

ROME.—Under the title of "Società Giovanni Sebastiano Bach," a Bach Society has just been founded here upon the lines of the already existing Palestrina and Beethoven Societies. There are already numerous applicants for membership from aristocratic and artistic quarters in this capital. Six concerts are to be given during the season, under the direction of Signor Allessandro Costa.

ST. PETERSBURG.—A grand Concert was given here last month by Herr Leopold Auer, the eminent violinist, with the assistance of the orchestra of the Imperial Musical Society, on which occasion Tschaïkowsky's "Sinfonie Pathétique" was given, and the Emperor William's "Song to Ægir" was sung by a choir of some six hundred voices. Herr Auer conducted, and also played Beethoven's Violin Concerto.——Josef Hoffmann has just given a Concert here at the Hall of Peers to an audience numbering over 3,000, whose enthusiasm took the form of carrying the young artist in triumph through the Hall at the conclusion of the performance.

STUTTGART.—Humperdinck's already so much talked-of new fairy play, "The wolf and the seven kids," was given here for the first time last month at the Court Theatre, the performance being for a charitable purpose. The feeling of the audience was, on the whole, one of disappointment. As we have already indicated, the new work would seem to be intended in the first place for performance in private circles. There is a great deal of spoken dialogue in the piece, and the music, replete with popular elements, and clever, as it could scarcely fail to be, really plays a secondary part.

TRIESTE.—A new Mass by the well-known composer of church music, Signor Guiseppe Rota, was performed recently for the first time at the Cathedral here, under the composer's direction. It proved a valuable composition and created a profound impression.

VIENNA.—The composer, Herr Heuberger, has been appointed assistant musical critic of the Neue Freie Presse in the room of the late Dr. Albert von Hermann, whose death we announce in another column.

MUSIC IN BELFAST.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

ON November 23 the new Saturday "Pops" were inaugurated in the Ulster Hall, under the management of Mr. Louis Mantell, with the most satisfactory result, the building being crowded; and on the Saturday following (30th) there seemed to be no diminution in either the attendance or interest. Through the hall being engaged until the end of the year there will be a short interval until the 4th inst., when these Concerts will get into full swing again. On November 29 the Philharmonic Society gave its second Subscription Concert in the Ulster Hall, when Haydn's "Creation" was performed, with orchestral selections and miscellaneous pieces. The artists were Miss Esther Palliser, Mr. Chambers Coleman, and Mr. Watkin Mills. The attendance was all that could be wished, and the performance reflected the greatest credit on Mr. F. Koeller, the conductor of the Society.

Mr. Farley Sinkins gave his third Concert in the Ulster Hall, on the 11th ult., when the following artists appeared: Madame Belle Cole, Mdlle. Ghita Corri, Mr. Joseph O'Mara, and Mr. Charles Magrath as vocalists; and Mr. Gordon Tanner (solo violin), Mr. de Jong (solo flute), and Mr. Sydney Brooks (solo violoncello); Dr. Collisson acting as accompanist.

The interest manifested here in the annual performance of Handel's immortal oratorio "The Messiah" has now increased to such an extent as to necessitate a second performance, and when it is mentioned that at the two Concerts given by the Philharmonic Society, on the 13th and 14th ult., money had to be refused at the doors, it looks as if a third Concert would be required to meet the demand for seats. The artists engaged were Madame Amy Sherwin, Miss Dews, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. Arthur Barlow, all of whom did their respective duties well and to the satisfaction of the audience. The choral work was efficiently rendered, Mr. F. Koeller again acting as conductor.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

DECEMBER in matters musical here has been one of the busiest months within my recollection, which dates from 1854. A summary of the principal musical events must, therefore, suffice.

Messrs. Harrison's second popular Subscription Concert again attracted an enormous assembly, and rarely has our fine Town Hall presented a more brilliant coup d'œil. The occasion was an exceptional one, as Miss Nikita made her début. Miss Margaret Macintyre was heard at the same Concert. Miss Nikita's brilliant style of vocalisation is certainly the principal feature of her art, but disappointment was felt in the direction of voice quality. Miss Macintyre, who has not been heard here for some time, was received with acclamation. Her voice has considerably increased in volume, and, in the rendering of "Robert, toi que j'aime," she showed considerable tone power and dramatic feeling. One of the most genuine successes of the Concert was secured by Miss Ada Crossley, the Australian contralto, who appeared as a débutante. Her voice is not only rich in quality, but most sympathetic, and her phrasing is artistic to a degree.

Mr. Stockley's second Orchestral Concert served to introduce Herr Reisenauer to local audiences. The famous German pianist caused quite a furore by his marvellous mastery of the keyboard, and no player since Rubinstein has raised such excitement here at a first appearance. The orchestral pieces consisted of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Goldmark's Overture "Sakuntala," Wagner's Vorspiel to "Tristan und Isolde," and Beethoven's Overture "Coriolanus." The works had been well prepared by Mr. Stockley, especially Goldmark's Overture, and altogether the Concert must be recorded as one of the best and most interesting ever given by him.

The Jubilee year of the Festival Choral Society was celebrated by a magnificent Concert under Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap's direction. The works given consisted of Mr. Edward Elgar's cantata "The Black Knight," Beethoven's Choral Symphony, and the third act from Wagner's "Lohengrin," for which the following principals had been secured: Madame Ella Russell, Miss Stanley Lucas, Miss Lucie Johnston, Mr. O'Mara, and Mr. Norman Salmond. From the very beginning of the cantata Mr. Elgar shows a perfect mastery over his subject, in the realisation of which he has been thoroughly happy. His orchestration is full of colour and displays many original touches, and his part-writing is unconventional to a degree. The performance, although by no means perfect, showed careful preparation. Beethoven's Choral Symphony is specially worthy of record on account of the superb singing of the chorus in the choral Finale. The purity of soprani and tenori, and their firm attack, were distinct features of the performance. Of the various movements the Scherzo and the Adagio were by far the best rendered. The third act of "Lohengrin" was superbly given, Madame Ella Russell astonishing all hearers by the intensity and purity of her singing. Mr. O'Mara was also in excellent voice and sang with rare feeling. Dr. Heap has shown that he is most earnest in his endeavours, and has proved himself an experienced conductor.

The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company gave a week's season of operas at the Theatre Royal. The principal interest centred in the revival of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" and Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon." Madame Ella Russell, as Senta, surpassed her previous efforts in Wagnerian opera, and Mr. Ludwig's Van der Decken is too well known to need comment. Mdlle. Zelie de Lussan appeared as Carmen and as Mignon, achieving the utmost success in both parts. The arduous duties of the tenor devolved upon Mr. Barton McGuckin, duties which this accomplished artist fulfilled to the letter. The other operas given during the week were "Tannhäuser," "Hänsel und Gretel," "Cavalleria Rusticana," and "Pagliacci."

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

The chief musical event in Bristol during the past month was the performance, by the Choral Society, of Handel's "Messiah," which took place at Colston Hall on the 21st ult. Mr. Riseley was not content to bring it forward without preparation, for at several weekly practices the more difficult points in the choruses were carefully rehearsed, and as a consequence Handel's masterpiece was unfolded with splendid results, which redound to the praise of the conductor and the choir. The band (led by Mr. Theo. Carrington) and voices numbered about 500. The principals were Miss Kate Cove, Madame M. Hooton, Mr. H. Kearton, and Mr. Douglas Powell; and Mr. J. H. Fulford presided at the organ.

After two postponements, the Bristol Orpheus Glee Society, numbering ninety members, went to Windsor on the evening of the 2nd ult. and sang to the Queen, some of her children, and members of the Court the following glees and part-songs, chiefly by English writers: "God save the Queen," arranged by G. Riseley; "Strike the Lyre," T. Cooke; "The long day closes," Sir A. S. Sullivan; "Hohenlinden," T. Cooke; "Peace," C. Lee Williams; "The Pedlar's Song," C. Lee Williams; "Ossian's Hymn to the Sun," Sir J. Goss; "The Dying Child," J. J. Viotta; "The Retreat," L. de Rille; "Stars of the Summer Night," W. A. C. Cruickshank; "God save the Queen." The magnificent singing (unaccompanied) of the members of the choir, who are famed for refinement, the delicacy of their pianissimo effects, and the brilliancy and clearness of the alto voices so pleased her Majesty that she asked for further examples of the accomplishments of the Society, and Walter Macfarren's "Highland War Song" and Hatton's "Absence" were added. The Queen and members of the Court subsequently complimented Mr. Riseley and the Society, and observed that the perfection of their singing had been a delightful surprise, and on the 13th ult. the Queen sent Mr. Riseley a handsome bâton.

Unaccompanied part-singing is perhaps cultivated more and brought to greater perfection in Bristol than in any city in the Kingdom. The same evening that the Orpheus Glee Society went to Windsor, the Æolian Male Choir, which, though a young body, has attained wonderful efficiency under the guidance of Mr. Sleigh, gave a Concert in the Vestry Hall, St. Philip's, and sang with neatness and taste a number of part-songs and glees to the gratification of a numerous assemblage.

Three days later a large audience gathered in the Victoria Rooms, Clifton, to listen to the Bristol Gleemen, who, for a charitable object, unfolded the beauties of several compositions by English, German, and other writers. Among them were Krugh's "Hark the merry Drum," Callcott's "Peace to the souls of the Heroes," Trühn's "The Three Chafers," Laurent de Rille's "Like Fairy Elves," and Engelsberg's "The Students' March." Under the guidance of Mr. W. J. Kidner, all the pieces were well rendered, and, together with songs by Madame Gomez, were highly appreciated by the audience.

In The Musical Times of last January reference was made to the increase in the number of churches of the city and neighbourhood in which suitable cantatas, selections from oratorios, and carols were sung during Advent and at Christmas. Now I have to record the gratifying fact that still more places of worship have been added to this catalogue. It is unnecessary to mention every sacred building where such musical services took place this year. A few only may suffice. Spohr's "Last Judgment" was given at St. Andrew's, Montpelier, on the 1st ult.; St. John's Choral Society gave a creditable rendering of the "Hymn of Praise," under the direction of Mr. A. E. Hill, on the 11th ult.; Mozart's Requiem Mass was given in St. Thomas's Church, City, on the 9th ult.; Garrett's "The Two Advents" was given on the 12th, in St. Mary Redcliffe Church, where it should be mentioned the movement of making services more musical (which has since so widely extended) was initiated by Mr. J. W. Lawson. In the majority of the churches and many other places of worship carols were sung at Christmas.

At the Popular Chamber Concert, on the 14th ult., Anton Dvorák's Sextet for strings (Op. 48) and Mozart's Quintet (No. 6) for strings were the concerted works performed, the executants being Messrs. Ward, Bernard, Gardner, Woodward, Pavey, and Pomeroy. The instrumental solo was Hans Sitt's Concertstück for viola (Op. 46), contributed by Mr. F. S. Gardner. Messrs. Ward and Bernard were associated in an Andante from a Concerto of Bach for two violins. Miss Alice Hodder sang songs, two being by Mr. Cyril B. Rootham, who, with Miss Edith Payne, acted as accompanist.

The Ballad and Instrumental Concert in Clifton, on November 25, in which Madame Duma and nine other artists took part, was well attended; as was that of the Glasgow Select Choir, on November 29. The Recital, on the 7th ult., of Mr. Ernest Young, who was assisted by Miss Lock and Mr Venn, was a success. The famous "Besses-o'-th'-Barn" brass band gave two Concerts in Bristol on the 14th ult. During the week commencing November 25 the opera company of Mr. D'Oyley Carte gave representations of "Utopia, Limited" and "Princess Ida" at the landlord get to high words, in the midst of which Young Benson and Edmunds, Martin Stokes and Flam appear. The result is that Old Benson has notice to quit the farm, and the Act ends with a sestet, led off by Young Benson, who sings:

Turn him from the farm! From his home will you cast
The old man who has tilled it for years?
Every tree, every flower, is link'd with the past,
And a friend of his childhood appears.

The second Act opens in the Hall. The Squire is expressing to Flam regret for his hasty conduct when Lucy and Rose enter, the former being also in repentant mood. She begs the Squire to cease his attentions, but he simply answers:

Hear me, when I swear that the farm is your own
Through all changes Fortune may make.

This is the beginning of a quartet, in which Young Benson, who has followed his sister, expresses contempt for the Squire's promises. [Exeunt omnes.] Flam now enters. He has a scheme for carrying off Lucy, and, Martin Stokes opportunely arriving, enlists that worthy's services. Stokes imagines, however, that Rose, not Lucy, is to be the victim. The action now moves to "an open space in the village." Enter the Squire, still in virtuous mood. He will reform, give up cities and live happily in the country. Sings:

A country life, without the strife
And noisy din of town,
Is all I need, I take no heed
Of splendour or renown.
And when I die, oh, let me lie
Where trees above me wave,
Let wild plants bloom around my tomb,
My quiet country grave.

We are now once more in the rickyard, where Young Benson laments the approaching break-up of the old home, and sings:

My fair home is no longer mine;
From its roof-tree I'm driven away:
Alas! who will tend the old vine,
Which I planted in infancy's day?

—and so on to the same effect. Father and son, with the two girls, are just leaving the old home when the Squire enters, imploring Old Benson to remain. "You implore me to remain here," cries the Farmer, "I spurn your offer. Here? A father yielding to the destroyer of his child's good name and honour!" &c. Explanations follow, and everything is proved to be all right, even Edmunds being satisfied. In the scene which follows, Martin Stokes, aware of how the land lies, betrays Flam and saves Lucy, who now is repentant, and sings:

The gay morn breaks,
Mists roll away,
All Nature awakes
To glorious day.
In my breast alone
Dark shadows remain;
The peace it has known
In can never regain.

The final scene and dénouement follow, ending with a chorus:

Join the dance, with step as light
As every heart should be to-night;
Music shake the lofty dome,
In honour of our harvest-home.

No light bound
Of stag or timid hare,
O'er the ground
Where startled herds repair,
Do we prize
So high, or hold so dear,
As the eyes
That light our pleasures here.

PURCELL AND DR. ARNE.

THE November (1895) number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, under the above heading, gave an interesting letter written by the late Vincent Novello addressed to a well-known autograph collector, Josiah French, of Windsor, enquiring as to the authenticity of a remarkable letter written by Arne. The article in THE MUSICAL TIMES says: "It would be interesting to know what has become of this 'very curious and singular,' and we may add ancient, letter. It is scarcely likely that it has been destroyed." I propose to say a few words respecting Arne and his views of musical art by way of introduction to the original autograph letter, which has been in my possession since 1884, and is here reproduced in fac-simile. Arne was gifted with a splendid faculty for melody, as is proved by his songs "Where the bee sucks," "Blow, thou winter wind," "Under the greenwood tree," and many others; he was also well equipped as a harmonist, in proof of which may be cited the noble national song, "Rule, Britannia," and his many glees; but he lacked the qualities which seem to be indispensable to greatness: he was wholly wanting in moral principle and self respect. It is not necessary to rake up all the wretched story of the treatment of his wife: suffice it to say he was as bad a husband as one could possibly find; and again, commencing life as a Roman Catholic, he by degrees divested himself of all outward respect for religion, and had the indecency to compose a Latin Ode in which the most sacred rite of the Church of his early faith was shamefully travestied. I may add, in passing, that on his death-bed he professed repentance of his evil ways and was reconciled to the Church. Arne's one object and motive in life seems to have been self-indulgence and self-glorification; he pretended to despise the works of Purcell and Handel; whether he really did so, or whether he acted purely from jealousy when he attempted to detract from their merits, is a moot point; my own opinion inclines to the latter suggestion, for it seems impossible that such an excellent musician should have been deaf and blind to the greatness of his predecessor, Purcell, and his contemporary, Handel. Arne probably owed some of his mental and moral weaknesses to early example, his father, who had been an upholsterer in King Street, Covent Garden, died miserably in the Fleet Prison. He had been full of ambitious views for his son's future, whom he had educated at Eton, hoping he might one day shine as a lawyer; but, born with an innate love of music, the young Arne surreptitiously practised the harpsichord, and frequently, disguised as a footman in livery, obtained, by that means, gratuitous admission to the gallery of the Opera-house. He speedily became a proficient in the art of music, and when eighteen years of age saw the performance of his first opera, "Rosamund," in which his sister, whom he had taught, sang the principal part. This work was the forerunner of many others, some, like "Comus," were successful, but the greater number proved failures. In 1770 Garrick produced at Drury Lane Theatre an improved and revised version of Dryden's "King Arthur," and doubtless at that time Arne was regarded as the most accomplished theatre musician; it was therefore quite natural that Garrick should consult him as to the possibility of including Purcell's music, originally written for the play, in the revival. Bearing in mind what has been already said of Arne's character, it will not perhaps create much surprise to read the letter here given which he addressed to Garrick.

The score of "King Arthur," as prepared by Arne, is lying before me; the title reads: "The Songs, Airs, Duetts and Chorusses in the Masque of King Arthur, as perform'd at the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane. Compos'd by Purcel and Dr. Arne." I find the Overture is by Arne, and by no means as good as Purcell's; the chorus, "We have sacrificed," the duet, "The white horse neigh'd," and the whole of the first scene are by Purcell. It is somewhat significant to find, notwithstanding Arne's faint-hearted commendation of Purcell's "Come, if you dare," and the invitation to reject it in favour of his own superior composition, that Purcell's was, after all, the one which was performed; Arne did his best, however, to take out some of its spirit ("intrepidity") by eliminating the trumpet and drum parts.* Arne next introduces a recitative and an air of his own, the words partly by Dryden, leading into an air and chorus, "Hither this way," which he forgets to credit to Purcell. Arne discards Purcell's pretty song and chorus, "How blest are shepherds," in favour of a song of his own. He also mutilates the duet and chorus "Shepherds leave decoying" in a barbarous manner, and also interpolates several airs for Mrs. Baddeley. Purcell's inimitable "frost scene" he did not meddle with. The various instrumental interludes by Purcell are treated in ruthless fashion. After the simple air, "Fairest Isle," Arne substitutes a solo and chorus, "Saint George," in place of Purcell's vigorous composition.

It is impossible to discover what amount of truth there was in Arne's assertion that "the solo songs of Purcell are so infamously bad that they are privately the objects of sneer and ridicule to the musicians" (meaning, of course, the orchestral performers); but it is significant that at the revival of "King Arthur," at Drury Lane Theatre in 1842, under Macready's management, the whole of Purcell's music obtainable was performed, and not one note of Arne's. A few years after writing this extraordinary letter respecting Purcell's music we find Arne prostituting his talents in composing music to a wretched parody on "Alexander's Feast," written by Dryden, and set to music by Handel; the libretto was the work of an anonymous "scribbler." Arne's music is contained in two MS. oblong folio volumes, entitled "Whittington's Feast, a new parody on 'Alexander's Feast.' Written by a College Wag. The Overture, Songs, &c., with all the Grand Chorusses composed by Thomas Augustine Arne, Doctor of Music." The libretto is a very despicable performance, burlesqueing the noblest Ode that had ever been written in any language; and Arne travestied Handel's music on a similarly low level.

In conclusion, it must be borne in mind that Arne's want of reverence and appreciation of Purcell's genius and works found a parallel in the treatment of Shakespeare's plays by poets and playwriters from Dryden downwards.

W. H. Cummings.

* "Champness's songs, the chorus in the first scene of Mr. Vernon's 'Come, if you dare,' and several other things were laid aside in favour of Purcell's music, which (though excellent in its kind) was Cathedral, and not to the taste of a modern theatrical audience."—Arne to Garrick, September 3, 1775.

ESSAYS IN MUSICAL CRITICISM.

Our readers cannot have failed to notice of late years the immense strides which musical criticism, in the hands of its most enlightened representatives, has taken in the direction of elegance of style and candour of expression. In proof of this contention we cannot do better than give the following interesting specimens which have lately fallen into our hands:—

(The Finicking.)

Dudelsack's New Symphony.

In this world of inevitable compromise and imperfect accomplishment, one must not ask too much, but be content with what the gods give us. And when they give us Dudelsack, with his magnificent sensuality of conception, and his superb clarity of style, we are fain to fly to superlatives for the adequate expression of our opinion. 'Tis true that this miraculous youth has not yet completed his twelfth year, and hence his music is now and then slightly lacking in the virile erotism of Wagner or the dainty filigree work of Albert Chevalier. Still, with these inevitable deductions, Dudelsack's Symphony is a marvel of gay, voluptuous, and irresponsible frivolity. The tender, twittering Scherzo sped along—shall we say?—like a covey of canaries in full cry; while the suavely serene Andante is instinct with a positively Pentecostal fervour. To analyse its science, to discuss its school, to measure its genius with the foot-rule of pedantry, may prove a congenial task to those—well—fatuous scribes who prefer Jenny Lind to Jenny Hill. For ourselves, we scout such pettifogging Prince's Theatre. A gratifying and well deserved presentation was made, on the 3rd ult., by the Bristol Choral Society to Mr. J. H. Fulford, the accompanist, and who also does other excellent service in musical circles of our city.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

The Dublin Musical Society gave its first Concert for the season at the Royal University, Earlsfort Terrace, on the 3rd ult. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was the work presented, and the principal vocalists were Miss Jessie Scott, Miss McConnell, Mr. J. Leyland, and Mr. Andrew Black. The performance was artistically and financially successful, and the training of the choir and band of 360 performers was in accordance with the high standard always maintained by the Society. Dr. Joseph Smith conducted, Mr. John Horan, sen., was organist, and Mr. Werner led the strings.

The Irish Arts and Crafts Exhibition opened at the Royal University on the 2nd ult., with a performance of Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Inaugural Ode," conducted by Mr. Th. Werner; during its course Glee and Ballad Concerts of Irish music were given under the direction of Dr. T. H. R. Jozé and others, and during the fortnight before its closing Prize Competitions were held for Military and Trade Bands, the adjudicators being Messrs. Van Maanen, T. Douglas, and Th. Werner.

Dr. W. H. Collisson's humorous Irish opera, "The Knight of the Road," was revived on the occasion of the opening of a new wing to the Rotunda Hospital by the Countess Cadogan, on the 4th ult.; and the charitable fêtes, "Cyclopia" and "Sing-Su-Hay," at the Leinster Hall, gave occasion for various Ballad and Glee Concerts under the direction of Mr. Vincent O'Brien, Mr. Andrew Keane, the Leinster Choral Society, &c.

The third of the Dublin Popular Concerts took place on Saturday, the 14th ult., at Leinster Hall, the principal artists being Madame Belle Cole, Miss Ghitta Corri, Messrs. Joseph O'Mara, Charles Magrath, Gordon Tanner, Sydney Brooks, C. de Jong, and Dr. Collisson (accompanist). The same names were announced for the Concert of the 21st ult.

The Dublin University Society gave Purcell's "Dido and Æneas" at its first Concert, which was held on Saturday afternoon, the 14th ult., in the Examination Hall, Trinity College. The principal solo parts were undertaken by Miss Ada Craig, with amateurs of the Society. Mr. Charles Marchant was conductor.

Places at the Royal Dublin Society's Recitals of Classical Chamber Music are now so sought for that it is very difficult to obtain admittance. On Monday, the 9th ult., the following programme was announced: Haydn's String Quartet in D minor, Beethoven's Violoncello Sonata in A (Op. 69), and Schumann's Quartet in E flat.

Mr. Charles Kelly's annual benefit Concert took place at the Antient Concert Rooms on the 7th ult., when the popular basso was assisted by the principal musicians of Dublin and achieved a brilliant success.

"The Messiah" was, as usual, given by the Dublin Musical Society as an extra Christmas performance, on the 18th ult., at the Royal University, with Miss Frengley (a member of the choir), Miss Clara Butt, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. Douglas Powell in the principal parts; Dr. Joseph Smith conducting.

The Examinations for Degrees in Music, at the University of Dublin, were held at Trinity College, on the 16th, 17th, and 18th ult. The following satisfied the examiners: First examination for Mus. Bac. degree, W. A. Taylor; second examination for Mus. Bac. degree, Allan Paterson; examination for Mus. Doc. degree, W. H. Hannaford.

On the 19th and 20th ult. Professor Prout gave Lectures on Bach's forty-eight Preludes and Fugues at Dublin University.

MUSIC IN DUNDEE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Dundee Amateur Choral Union gave its first Concert of the season on the 18th ult., with Mr. C. Dreschler Hamilton as conductor. The work chosen was Costa's "Naaman." Mrs. Fisk, Mr. Hedmondt, and Mr. Bispham were the soloists, and did very good work. Miss Amy Sargent was unable to appear on account of illness, and special praise is due to Mrs. Haden, who undertook the soprano solos at a very short notice, and sang them admirably. The chorus was in good form, and may be particularly commended for a fine performance of the chorale "When famine over Israel prevailed," and the Sanctus.

At the second of the Harrison Simpson Concerts, held on the 5th ult., the artists were Miss Nikita, Miss Ada Crossley, Miss Pauline St. Angelo, Messrs. Jack Robertson, Santley, and Popper.

An enjoyable Concert was given on October 23 by Madame Albani, assisted by Miss Clara Butt, Messrs. Norman Salmond, Johannes Wolff, Hollman, and Raoul Pugno. Special mention must be made of a really perfect rendering of Rossini's "Quis est homo," by Madame Albani and Miss Butt.

A Recital was given on November 27, by M. Sarasate and Madame Marx-Goldschmidt. Among local events, there have been two meetings of the Dundee Society of Musicians, on November 2 and the 14th ult., the first being entirely devoted to works by Brahms. Mr. S. Fraser Harris delivered the concluding Lectures on Mozart, Beethoven, and Wagner on November 12 and 26 respectively, to appreciative audiences.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

Mendelssohn's "Athalie" was the principal attraction at the fourth and last interim Concert occurring between the triennial Festivals of 1893 and 1896, which took place in St. Andrew's Hall on the 5th ult., before a large and fashionable audience. Miss Teresa Blamy, Miss Sylvia Rita, and Miss Gordon Scott took the principal parts, while the narrative verses were powerfully declaimed by Mr. Charles Fry, who made his first appearance in Norwich. The Norwich chorus, assisted by contingents from Yarmouth and Lowestoft, were in grand form, and showed continued signs of improvement, attributable in a great measure to the painstaking trouble bestowed upon the voices by the chorusmaster, Dr. Horace Hill. The band consisted mainly of members of the local Philharmonic Society, with the addition of a few professionals in the wind department, and was led by Mr. F. W. B. Noverre, with Dr. Bunnett at the organ. The combination of these forces resulted in a fine performance of the work. In addition to songs by the principals, several orchestral works by the band, and a masterly delivery of Baring-Gould's "Building of St. Sofia" (with organ accompaniment) by Mr. Fry—who received almost an ovation—the audience had the opportunity of hearing Dr. Bunnett's scena with chorus ("Rhineland") during the second half of the Concert. This slight work, which was specially composed for the Norwich Festival of 1872, like the bulk of the worthy doctor's works, is graceful, melodious, and elegant. Miss Blamy sang the soprano solos most charmingly, and it goes without saying that band and chorus did their share con amore. "Rhineland" is well worth the notice of provincial choral societies. It is a pleasure to say that the series of interim Concerts now brought to a close have been the most successful ever given in the City, and reflect the greatest credit upon those concerned in their inception and maturing.

The Norwich Orchestral Union chose Dr. Armes's "Hezekiah" for performance at its appearance on the 11th ult. The vocal quartet comprised Miss Louise Burns, Miss Gazely (a rising local contralto), Mr. Chambers-Coleman, and Mr. F. B. Ranalow, each doing good service in their several parts. The chorus (numerically small in tenors and basses) gave a capital account of the work falling to its share. The band, mainly composed of juvenile performers, was hardly up to the composer's requirements, which in many places necessitates experienced players. Mr. Ernest Harcourt conducted with much ability. The second half of the programme comprised the miscellaneous selection usual upon such occasions.

The Great Yarmouth Musical Society was heard in Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" on November 26, Mr. Haydon Hare, organist at St. Nicholas, making his first appearance as conductor. It was no easy task to follow so thorough a musician as Mr. Stonex, who so ably presided over the Society for many years, but Mr. Hare is likely to prove a useful successor. Perhaps it was not quite wise to attempt a work which requires every member of the orchestra to be a master of his instrument, as does the opening Symphony of the "Hymn of Praise"; but considering the force at command it went with commendable precision. The body of choristers, although not large, did their work with conscientious zeal, the majestic opening chorus and the grand concluding one being given with much vigour. The soloists were Miss Annie Norledge, Miss May Sieber (a local aspirant to fame who is likely to be heard of in the near future), and Mr. W. Fell. The second half of the programme included the Overture to "Ruy Blas," a part-song, "The Rose," from the pen of the conductor, and a miscellaneous selection.

The Great Yarmouth Orchestral Society came before the public for the first time this season on the 14th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. C. W. Moss. The Society is numerically strong, with a good sprinkling of ladies at the violin desks; but it showed wisdom on the part of the conductor not to attempt a whole Symphony, the Andante from No. 1 of Beethoven being the only piece in the programme of a classical character. Two movements from Gade's Trio (Op. 42) were very well played by Messrs. Hare, Moss, and J. F. W. Bray. Vocal selections were given by Miss Gertrude Bevan and Mr. S. Heath.

The Beccles Choral Society gave a performance of Handel's "Messiah" on the 9th ult. The solo parts were filled by Miss A. Stannard, Miss Parsons Norman, Mr. H. W. Gunston, and Mr. J. H. Brockbank. The Beccles Orchestral Band were responsible for the accompaniments, led by Mr. W. H. Delf. Mr. W. W. Harvey conducted a highly creditable performance.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Scottish Orchestra, under M. Kes's skilful training, has made great strides alike in the excellence of its performances and in public favour. The large audiences which hitherto have been the conspicuous feature of the new orchestral scheme in Edinburgh have been fully maintained, and little but praise of the new conductor is to be heard on all sides. The "Jupiter" Symphony, with which the third Concert of Messrs. Paterson's series was opened (on the 2nd ult.), suffered from the somewhat deliberate tempo to which M. Kes's beat is prone; but the delicacy of Moszkowski's Suite in F (Tema with Variations and one other movement), the vague and fugitive character of the outlines in a Prelude from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," and the surging excitement of the "Tannhäuser" Overture were faithfully reflected. The climax of the Overture was given with magnificent power. Miss Evangeline Florence contributed a long scena from Thomas's "Hamlet" and an aria from Gounod's "Mirella" with much acceptance, and she succeeded in securing the A flat in alt, as well as the enhutsiastic applause of the large audience.

At the fourth Concert (16th ult.) a new dramatic cantata by the talented young composer, W. Augustus Barratt, was produced for the first time. "The Death of Cuthullin," commissioned specially for these Concerts, is written for soprano, tenor, and bass soli, chorus and orchestra. No work could have a better chance of adequate performance than at the hands of Mr. Kirkhope's magnificent band of singers. The "choir" has developed into a full-blown chorus and need fear no competition from any quarter. Every justice was done to the many effective choral passages; and the description of the "Combat," and "Blow soft, O Norland gale" (a very clever boat song with haunting refrain), were loudly applauded. The different choruses for "Maidens" and for "Bards," as well as the final scene, "Lament for Cuthullin," were also well received. The general impression was much marred by the unfortunate indisposition of Miss Sargent, who should have sung the important solos assigned to Bragéla. It is no discredit to the ladies who at three hours' notice bravely undertook the difficult task of supplying the voice parts of not too "vocal" music that the intentions of the composer were not always so manifest as the anxiety of performers and audience. Mr. Peterkin was eminently successful in the bass solos, and Mr. Lloyd Chandos sang "Carril's Song" (the most obvious melody in the work) in a way which drew forth the warm applause of the audience. Mr. Barratt was called to the platform at the close to receive hearty congratulations. The choir was of course perfectly at home in the "Hymn of Praise," which formed the second part of the programme, and Mr. Kirkhope's successful efforts were fully recognised by audience and chorus alike.

At the special Advent services in St. Mary's Cathedral Mr. Charles Macpherson's new Psalm, "By the Waters of Babylon," was given by the combined choirs of the Cathedral, under Mr. Collinson's direction, on the 13th ult. The Psalm has already been performed at the Royal College of Music with great success. The work was admirably rendered and its many beauties made a deep impression. The anthem was a selection from the "Hymn of Praise," in the solo parts of which Mr. Gledhill's beautiful voice and finished style were heard to great advantage. A capable orchestra of about forty players lent valuable support in one of the most successful of the many choral successes at the Cathedral.

On the 18th ult. the choir of St. Paul's Episcopal Church gave a performance of Spohr's "Last Judgment," under the direction of Mr. Prendergast, organist of the Church.

On November 29 Señor Sarasate, assisted by Madame Berthe Marx-Goldschmidt, gave his annual Recital. The audience was not quite so large as the great violinist has a right to expect in Edinburgh, but it responded as readily as of yore to the potent magic of his bow.

On the 14th ult. an enormous audience taxed the utmost resources of the Empire Theatre to hear Herr Rosenthal's first Recital in Edinburgh. The great pianist elected to make his début here in the "Appassionata" Sonata, and there is no work in which an audience can better gauge a new pianist's place among the great artists. Herr Rosenthal's phenomenal technique compelled the unstinted admiration of his audience, and a wave of enthusiasm swept over the building after the magnificent tour de force in Liszt's "Masaniello" Fantasie. His greatest artistic successes were won in two encores—Schubert's charming little Impromptu in F minor and Chopin's "Berceuse."

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

True enough it is that the management of the Choral and Orchestral Union has entered upon a rather drastic change of programmes, alike as regards the "Classical" nights and the Saturday "Popular" evenings. Whether Codlin or Short is our best friend it is not for the writer of these notes to discuss at the present moment, and it, therefore, only remains to record one outstanding matter of fact. It is this: the marked change in the composition of the Saturday programmes has sufficed to draw big audiences to St. Andrew's Hall. Lighter fare has, without a doubt, appealed to the people with notable success, and, as has been said over and over again, the people have a method of their own of showing what they really want. On the 14th ult., for example, an overflowing audience assembled in our leading concert-room to listen to the Procession music from Goldmark's "The Queen of Sheba," the "Tannhäuser" Overture, the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and the C minor Symphony. At a "Pop." one does not want much better than Beethoven's No. 5; as produced, moreover, under the bâton of Mr. Willem Kes, the new Conductor of the Scottish Orchestra, it would be hard to imagine a more enjoyable interpretation of the work. Mr. E. C. Hedmondt sang familiar selections from Weber and Wagner, and here again renewed evidence was in favour of the new order of things. On the Tuesday evenings the audiences have not, unfortunately, been great. Mr. Moriz Rosenthal showed again, however, what a name means, and thus it came to pass that this accomplished pianist attracted one of the largest houses of the season. The new-comer was at his best on the 10th ult.; so, also, Mr. Kes in his fine rendering of the Tschaïkowsky Symphony (No. 4) in F minor. Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah" was announced for performance too late for notice in our current issue in view of the Christmas holidays. It may, however, be mentioned that the Glasgow Choral Union has taken a well sustained interest in the work, and that the soloists retained for the performance included Mrs. Katharine Fisk, Messrs. Hedmondt, Andrew Black, and Bispham.

Paisley's own choir was to the fore on the 9th ult., when the local Choral Union gave a wonderfully fine performance of Gounod's "The Redemption." The enterprise of Mr. James Barr's Society is, indeed, commendable. The Union numbers close upon 250 voices, and the management do not for a moment hesitate to engage at least forty instrumentalists from the Scottish Orchestra when a choral work is on hand.

The Glasgow Glee and Catch Club gave a "Ladies' Night" on the 5th ult. It is only very occasionally that the coveted card is issued, and, to quote from an old-world writer, the meetings are invariably "elegant and fashionable." Mr. Allan Young conducted with all his wonted care and intelligence, and many hearty felicitations were exchanged on his restoration to good health.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Two Concerts by the Philharmonic Society have to be noted since the last record of music in these parts. At the first, which was given on the 3rd ult., Dr. Hubert Parry conducted a miscellaneous programme of no special merit, the playing of Mr. Rosenthal being chiefly responsible for raising it above the commonplace. On the 17th ult. Dr. C. Villiers Stanford succeeded for the evening to the conductor's seat, the leading feature of the performance being Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The appointment of a successor to the late Sir Charles Hallé is, up to the time of writing, still in abeyance. On the 6th ult. the Post Office Choral Society returned to its earlier and better paths, and after an interregnum of a season or so restored oratorio to its proper place at the annual Concert in the Philharmonic Hall. On the date named Haydn's "Creation" was given by the members under Mr. J. C. Clarke.

For the usual Advent oratorio at the Pro-Cathedral, Mr. Burstall had selected Gaul's cantata "The Ten Virgins," two performances of which work took place on the 5th and 12th ult. This somewhat meagre chronicle completes the list of what has been done in choral Liverpool during the past month. On the Cheshire side of the Mersey the Birkenhead Cambrian Choral Society has given Handel's "Messiah," under Mr. D. O. Parry; and at the same place Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" received good treatment at the hands of Mr. J. W. Appleyard and the St. Cecilia Society, on the 21st ult.; at Rock Ferry, on the 16th ult., Schumann's "Pilgrimage of the Rose" was performed, under Mr. Pemberton; and at Liscard, Handel's "Judas" formed the programme of the regular Christmas Concert, under Mr. Argent.

Orchestral music has again been considerably to the fore in this district. At St. George's Hall, on the 8th and 15th ult. respectively, Mr. H. A. Branscombe played Handel's fourth and second Organ Concertos at the Sunday Concerts, and the effect of the whole, accompanied by the fine body of strings in the regular band engaged for these performances, was extremely good. On the 14th ult. the Orchestral Society gave one of its annual Ladies' Concerts at the Philharmonic Hall, when Mr. Rodewald directed an excellent performance of Schubert's C major Symphony, Wagner's "Parsifal" Vorspiel, and other important selections. The same conductor—who, by the way, is now unfortunately underlined as pro tem.—on the 10th ult., once again showed what excellent work can be done by the Società Armonica when once its members are brought face to face with a sense of their responsibilities. A Haydn Symphony formed the chief feature of the programme. At the Concert previously-named some new and charming songs by Dr. Stanford were sung by Mr. Plunket Greene, accompanied by the composer; and at the performance last alluded to, a couple of clever and pretty novelties for orchestra were produced by Mr. C. W. Black, a young local writer.

At Runcorn, Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" was given, on the 16th ult.; and at Warrington, Handel's "Messiah," on the 18th ult., under Mr. F. H. Crossley.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

To the Thursday evening Concerts, which still bear the name of their lamented founder, Sir Charles Hallé, a peculiar interest has during the last two months attached. The special excellence of our Manchester orchestra had resulted not so much from the accomplishments of the individual players as from the absolutely unique relationship established between them and their accomplished chief, and from the close understanding and entire confidence which had grown up on both sides. Constant performance under one unfettered master during the winter months of many consecutive years had served to render the response of the band to whatever demands were made upon it as prompt and as nearly perfect as possible. Every listener felt that, whatever may be his conception as to the adequacy of the rendering, as to the too faint or too high colouring of any of the works produced, the interpretation was, at any rate, consistent with the intention of the conductor, and represented his sense of the meaning of each phrase. And so, although no doubt was or could be entertained that among our native-born artists we have many to whom the bâton might with absolute safety be entrusted, there was, nevertheless, a fear lest arrangements hurriedly made and frequently changed for the control of the orchestra until a permanent head could be secured might lead to a looser discipline, to the less satisfactory rendering of the classical masterpieces which we love, and to a diminution of energy in the production of new works not yet brought before us. Most happily, all such fears have proved groundless. The loyalty of the members of the orchestra has been unswerving, and the fitness of each selected chief for his responsible task has been amply demonstrated. Following Sir Arthur Sullivan we have had Sir Joseph Barnby, and under his guidance an entirely admirable rendering of the work with which we have of late years become so thoroughly familiar—viz., the "Faust" of Berlioz; and, on the 19th and 20th ult., two performances of "The Messiah." Mr. F. H. Cowen especially interested us by the fresh light which he threw upon Beethoven's Symphony in A, every note of which seemed to dwell in his memory. Even under the Viennese conductor, to whom our eyes are anxiously turned, no more intelligent unfolding of the great work has been given here. Sir A. C. Mackenzie gave such a masterly reading of the peculiarly complicated and intricate Fourth Symphony of Tschaïkowsky that we should be more than pleased could he be prevailed upon again to visit us, and especially if he would bring with him one of his delightful Scottish Rhapsodies. Professor Stanford has introduced here the work which he has labelled "L'Allegro ed il Pensieroso," of which the second movement proved far the most interesting; and when Mr. R. H. Wilson took in hand the "Lobgesang" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," the choir naturally testified their enthusiasm for their tutor and friend. But although such frequent changes bring before us many accomplished conductors, with whom we should otherwise not become acquainted, and are not without good result in securing effects to which we are unaccustomed, it is questionable whether the advent of a permanent chief could, without danger, be very long delayed. In the meantime, however, we have learnt that even in the Free Trade Hall a real pianissimo is possible, and the new-comer will be bound to occasionally secure such a relief; and perhaps he may venture a step farther, and by subduing the energy of the more blatant instruments secure our gratitude to an extent to which no one has yet earned it.

Our anxiety has been so wholly absorbed in the orchestral work that we have come to realise something of the true value of its guiding hand, and the far slighter importance of the vocalisation which serves to relieve the mind from its earnest strain and enables it to recover its elasticity and its readiness to receive new impressions; therefore the mere record must suffice that Madame Ella Russell—so extremely valued here in opera—has scarcely yet proved her capacity for oratorio; that Mdlle. Boye may possibly in time take rank among our acceptable contraltos; that Miss Margarethe Petersen is admirable in the smaller German and Swedish Lieder which find fitting place in the second part of a programme, but has some peculiarities of tone and roughnesses of style from which she would do well to free herself if she desires to find a home among us. But the opportunity which brought to the front Herr Carl Fuchs was welcome, although he employed it far more profitably in the smaller pieces, which he played with good tone and in admirable cantabile style, than in the Schumann Violoncello Concerto, which deserves not the care he bestowed upon it. There could be but one opinion respecting the splendid executive skill of Madame Carreño or of Herr Rosenthal, the two pianists who have been here; but we are bound to protest against the gross misconception of Mendelssohn's "Lieder," especially of No. 1, exhibited by the latter.

There was much to enjoy at the Concert which, on the 16th ult., Mr. Harrison gave in conjunction with Messrs. Hime and Addison, of this city. It is not always easy to understand why the efforts of some artists seem so violently to excite an audience, or to join in applause which appears grossly indiscriminating and even hurtful. But there was entire unanimity of opinion with respect to the finished rendering of Mozart's "L'Addio" by the young Australian, Miss Ada Crossley, who, at a time when such qualifications are too rare, brings us a rich contralto voice of even tone throughout its compass, and delivered with perfect freedom from that ridiculous affectation of hysterical emotion which suggests a half-paralyzed loss of control. Then the rejuvenated power and richness of Mr. Santley's voice and the almost rollicking joviality with which he rolled forth its sonorous tones brought again to us a pleasure which we had thought must have for ever passed. And, in the second Etude of Rubinstein's Op. 23, Miss St. Angelo showed a freedom of wrist and a crispness of touch for which we were scarcely prepared; while the violoncello playing of Herr Popper, although never devoted here to any great or lofty purpose, was finished and void of apparent effort.

One of our most esteemed pianoforte teaches, Mr. Max Mayer, gave, on the 9th ult., the first of a short series of Chamber Concerts. With Mr. F. Norton he introduced the Clarinet Sonata (Op. 120) of Brahms; with Mr. Brodsky the G major Duet (Op. 78) of the same author; and, with the further aid of Mr. Vieuxtemps, the Schumann Trio (Op. 63); before which closing piece Miss Petersen intermitted Schumann's Cycle of Songs (Op. 42), "Frauenlieben und Leben."

It is pleasant to be able to report continued improvement in Mr. Lane's choir, as shown in our first Christmas performance of "The Messiah," when the choruses were given with very considerably enhanced power and meaning.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On November 29 a very successful Concert was given in the Newcastle High School before a distinguished company of visitors. Mrs. James Heath, Miss Moore, Mr. Parkes, the High School Choir (under the direction of Mr. J. Alcock), Mr. Pawle, and Mr. Butterworth contributed to an excellent programme. The Meakin Popular Concerts still maintain their hold upon the people, and on the 2nd ult. the Victoria Hall was once more crowded. Dr. A. L. Peace, of Glasgow, gave an Organ Recital, and Miss Thudichum and the Westminster Glee Singers elicited unstinted applause.

"An Evening with Tennyson" was the title of a Musical Lecture given by the Rev. J. V. Rogerson, at the Hanley Presbyterian Church, on the 3rd ult.

With the object of rendering aid to the School Scholarship Fund the pupils of the Hanley Higher Grade School gave a Concert, on the 5th ult., at the Victoria Hall. A very lengthy programme was successfully carried out, with credit to the performers and instructors.

Mr. E. Brain conducted the eighteenth annual Children's Festival on the 10th ult., at the Fenton Town Hall. The children sang a number of part-songs with considerable taste and expression, giving strong evidence of careful training.

Miss Edith Hooley held a very successful Concert on the 10th ult., at the Tunstall Town Hall. Miss Shirley (Hanley) and Mr. Copestake (Longton) contributed vocal pieces.

The annual "Messiah" performance by the members of the Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society is eagerly looked forward to in this district. Given with the aid of Madame Fanny Moody, Miss Ransome, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Charles Manners, and a capable orchestra, on the 12th ult., it is natural that a vast audience should have been more than satisfied. At times the applause was a thing to be remembered. The choir was excellent, and Mr. Garner conducted with complete success. Mr. Johnson presided at the organ and Mr. T. Shaw led.

The Longton Choral Society presented "Alexander's Feast" and "Hear my Prayer" on the 12th ult., at its first Concert, in the Town Hall. Under Mr. E. H. Bloor's direction, a chorus of seventy voices, assisted by Miss Emily Davies, Mr. Gawthrop, Miss Jessie King, and Mr. W. H. Burgon, gave a good rendering of these two works. The Society is worthy of a larger measure of local support.

Mr. Elgar will write a cantata for the North Staffordshire Musical Festival. The meeting decided to have one day and two evening performances. The Guarantee Fund has reached £710 towards a total of £1,000 required.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

On the 4th ult. no less than three local choral societies gave Concerts. The South Shields Choral Society commenced its twelfth season with performances of the late Goring Thomas's choral ode "The Sun Worshippers," Sir Arthur Sullivan's dramatic cantata "On Shore and Sea," and sundry other pieces of a miscellaneous character. The principal vocalists were Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Sarah Berry, and Mr. Iver McKay, whose efforts were greatly appreciated. Mr. Alfred Oppenheim was solo violinist, Miss Annie Smith discharged the duties of accompanist, and Mr. Michael Fairs conducted. The Concert was largely attended and in every way successful.

The Jarrow Choral Society, on the same night, gave the first Invitation Concert of its sixth season, on which occasion the principal work performed was Dr. Hubert Parry's "Ode to St. Cecilia." The vocalists were Miss Emily Davies, Madame Marie Bellas, Mr. T. W. Page, and Mr. W. H. Burgon. Mr. T. Wilkinson presided at the organ, Miss Teresa Larkins at the pianoforte, and Mr. J. M. Preston was, as usual, the conductor.

The Chester-le-Street and District Choral Society gave a very creditable performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" early in the month, in the Wesleyan Church, Chester-le-Street. The principals were Madame Kate Robinson, Miss Mimi Beers, Mr. D. S. Macdonald, and Mr. R. G. Thwaites. A small orchestra was engaged, with Mr. J. H. Beers as leader, Mr. J. M. Preston was the organist, and the conductor was Mr. L. Dyer Appleby. The Society is now in its seventh season, and its proceedings are marked by a laudable ambition.

On the 7th ult., in connection with the People's Concerts under the auspices of the Corporation of Newcastle, a performance of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was given in the Town Hall, Newcastle-on-Tyne, by Dr. William Rea's Amateur Vocal Society. The solos were entrusted to Madame Adelaide Mullen, Miss Emily Himing, Mr. Henry Beaumont, and Mr. Gilbert King. Dr. Rea presided at the organ and Dr. G. F. Huntley conducted.

The annual Concert of the Northern Musicians' Benevolent Society took place in Olympia, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the 9th ult. The principal work upon the programme was

Mr. Edward German's Suite in D minor, composed for and produced at the recent Leeds Musical Festival. This remarkably fine work was, on the whole, creditably performed and very greatly appreciated. Other works presented were the "Rosamunde" Overture (Schubert), the Introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin" (Wagner), the ballet music from Gounod's "Reine de Saba," Rossini's "Semiramide" Overture, and Goltermann's Concerto in A minor for violoncello, the solo part being very creditably played by Miss Gertie Smith, a young lady just in her teens, who has decided talent. The vocalist was Mdlle. Zelie de Lussan, who created much enthusiasm, and Mr. J. H. Beers very ably conducted. This excellent Society was formed some few years ago for the purpose of raising a fund whereby those in the musical profession who need it may be assisted in the time of adversity.

The Durham University College Choral Society gave a very successful Concert of a miscellaneous character in the Castle Hall, Durham, on the 9th ult. The conductor of the Society is Mr. D. Whitehead, of Durham Cathedral.

The so-called Harrison Concerts took place in Sunderland on the 9th and in Newcastle on the 10th ult. The artists at both Concerts were Miss Nikita, Miss Ada Crossley, Mr. Jack Robertson, Mr. Santley, Miss St. Angelo (solo pianist), Herr Popper (violoncello), and Mr. Watkis (accompanist).

The Dunelm Choral Society gave a successful performance of Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" on the 11th ult., with Miss Annie Nelson, Miss Helen Ditchburn, Mr. Tom Child, and Mr. G. H. Ditchburn as principal vocalists, Miss Soper at the pianoforte, and Mr. F. E. Leatham at the organ. Mr. G. H. Ditchburn conducted.

One of the most important Concerts of the month was that given by the Sunderland Philharmonic Society, on the 16th ult. The first part of the programme consisted of selections from the works of Richard Wagner, including the "Holy Grail" scene from the first act of "Parsifal," and the second part included Arthur Somervell's short cantata "The Forsaken Merman," which was heard for the first time at the recent Leeds Festival. The vocalists were Madame Marie Duma and Mr. David Bispham. The chorus of the Society number some 150 voices, and an excellent orchestra of forty-five performers was engaged, the conductor being Mr. N. Kilburn. The Concert was in every way successful, and reflected the utmost credit upon all concerned in it.

Another equally good Concert was given by the Gateshead Choral Society, in the Town Hall, Newcastle, on the 17th ult., when Handel's "Israel in Egypt" was performed, under the direction of Mr. J. M. Preston. The feature of the performance was the admirable singing of the choir, the fine choruses with which the work abounds being given without exception in a manner which it would be difficult indeed to surpass. This Society has had a remarkably successful career and promises to achieve great things in the future. Good performances of important works for voices and orchestra are far too few in these counties, and the future of this Society will be looked forward to with very considerable interest.

Performances of Spohr's "Last Judgment" have been given during Advent in the Cathedral and in St. Thomas's Church, Newcastle.

"The Messiah" was given in the Town Hall, Newcastle, on the 23rd ult., by the Newcastle Harmonic Society; conductor, Dr. C. Chambers. The vocalists were Miss Gertrude Hughes, Miss Hannah Jones, Mr. Maldwyn Humphreys, and Mr. Wm. Llewelyn. Mr. G. F. Vincent presided at the organ.

The Newcastle Chamber Music Society gave its third Concert of the season in the Assembly Rooms, Newcastle, on the 18th ult. The principal pieces in the programme were Mendelssohn's String Quintet in B flat (Op. 87) and Svendsen's String Octet in A (Op. 3), the latter being played by Messrs. Arthur Bent, Wallace Sutcliffe, William Ackroyd, Alfred Wall, Alfred Hobday, Percy Kearne, Paul Ludwig, and Tennyson Werge. Mr. Emlyn Davies was the vocalist, and Mr. J. M. Preston presided at the pianoforte. The Concert was eminently successful and greatly enjoyed.

The Sunderland Chamber Music Society gave Concerts in Sunderland on November 29 and the 21st ult. At the former Mozart's Trio in G for pianoforte and strings, Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata, and a Trio for pianoforte and strings in D minor (Op. 25), by F. E. Bache, were performed; and at the latter Quartets by Mozart and Harvey Löhr, and Grieg's Sonata for pianoforte and violin in F (Op. 8). The performers were Mr. John Parker (flute), Mr. W. W. Lax (violin), Mr. L. A. Nicholson (viola), Mr. G. I. Simey (violoncello), Mr. Oscar Cohen (pianoforte), and the Rev. G. W. Anson Firth and Mr. J. M. Hardwick (vocalists).

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

At Herr Ellenberger's Classical Concert, on November 28, with the exception of the concluding piece (Brahms's Trio in C minor), solos were the order of the evening. Miss Ellenberger delighted her hearers in Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses" and in the Beethoven Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in D (Op. 12), which she played with her brother. Herr Ellenberger also gave Wieniawski's "Légende." Mr. Thorpe's violoncello playing is always anticipated with interest, and his one contribution (Becker's "Andante religioso") was scarcely enough. Miss Marjorie Eaton was the vocalist. We hope the future of these Concerts will reward Herr Ellenberger's talents both as performer and entrepreneur with the success they deserve.

The Sacred Harmonic Society's performance of "The Golden Legend" (Sullivan), on the 3rd ult., was characterised by the all-round excellence we have now come to associate with its undertakings. The vocalists were Miss Thudichum, Miss Meredyth Elliott, Mr. Piercy, Mr. Walter Ford, and Mr. Norman Salmond. Mr. George Essex presided at the organ with great judgment. The choral portions of the work were grandly sung by the large force under Mr. Adcock's control, "O gladsome Light" especially receiving a fine rendering. The band was equal to the exacting nature of the score, the many beautiful effects being adequately realised.

The West Bridgford Choral Society is progressing favourably, under Mr. J. S. Derbyshire's direction. On the 13th ult. it gave a creditable performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," as far as the choruses and soloists were concerned. The solos were entrusted to Miss Maggie Jacques, Miss Jessie Marshall-Ward, Mr. Henry Pyatt, and Mr. F. S. Gilbert, justly esteemed local favourites. We wish this young Society every success, and trust it may be the precursor of others which may strive to keep the taste for choral music alive in the suburban districts so rapidly growing around us.

The Philharmonic Choir's first Popular Concert, on the 14th ult., was fairly well attended, and we hope these Saturday Choral Concerts will develop into an established series, with a larger infusion of choral music in the programmes. The soloists were Miss Maggie Jacques (whose beautiful soprano voice was heard to advantage in Weber's "Softly sighs"), Miss Holbrook, and Mr. Walter Ford. Mr. J. H. Wakefield gave a musicianly rendering of Beethoven's Violin Sonata (Op. 24), the pianist being Mr. C. H. Oaksford. The choir, though less strong in numbers, has gained in purity of tone.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

The great musical event of the term that has just closed was undoubtedly the visit of Dr. Richter and his orchestra, on October 29. It was not, we believe, the first time that the famous Viennese conductor has visited Oxford, but so long an interval had elapsed that the performance had all the charm of novelty to the present generation, and excited a quite exceptional amount of interest.

The fifth series of the Public Classical Concerts has opened successfully, though a word of protest must be recorded with reference to a most thoroughly unsatisfactory performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony, on October 24. Spohr's Ninth Violin Concerto, as played by Fräulein Wietrowetz on October 24, and Schubert's Octet, as rendered on November 14, were both things to recollect. The singers were Miss Marie Brema and Mr. Plunket Greene, both well established favourites here.

Mr. Farmer's Concerts at Balliol have also pursued their usual course week by week, the most notable being an Orchestral Concert, at which Mozart's D minor Concerto for pianoforte formed the great attraction, and a Madrigal Concert, at which a special point was made of the compositions of Weelkes. At the Musical Union Invitation Concert (November 21), that Society again showed its devotion to Beethoven's later String Quartets, the C sharp minor being the specimen selected on this occasion.

It was eminently in accordance with the fitness of things that Sir John Stainer should select "Purcell" as the subject of his terminal public Lecture (November 19). Great pains had apparently been taken to provide an adequate supply of illustrations, the chief of them being the Te Deum, which was conducted by Professor Bridge.

Local musical Societies have not been very prominent. The St. Peter-le-Bailey Musical Society gave a selection from "The Messiah," in the Parish Church, at the beginning of December; and on November 21 the principal Society for men's voices, the Oxford Gleemen, gave a very successful Concert in the Holywell Music Room. Beyond this there is nothing to record.

Concerts, at which well-known performers have appeared, have, as usual, been so numerous as to entirely defy specification. Besides those whose names have been already incidentally mentioned, Messrs. Borwick, Rosenthal, and Sarasate have been playing, while amongst the singers it will be sufficient to record the appearance of Mesdames Gomez, Macintyre, Butt, and Palliser, and of Mr. Norman Salmond and the Meister Glee Singers. It is deplorable to be obliged to add that, as usual, the multitude of Concerts has tended to make the audiences at all of them very thin.

At the close of the term it was announced that Mr. F. Cunningham Woods, the Organist of Exeter College, was going to desert Oxford for London. This gentleman has for so many years played such a prominent part in musical doings here that the tidings came as somewhat of a shock. He has, of course, been the recipient of numerous testimonials, but the loud and widespread expressions of regret with which the news was received were unquestionably the best testimonial of all.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(From our own Correspondent.)

During the past month further steps have been taken towards the establishment of a permanent Musical Festival in Sheffield. A meeting has been called by the Mayor to consider the scheme, and there is every prospect that next year will see the musical attainments of Sheffield and district represented by a well-managed series of Festival performances.

The doings of the last month have been mainly instrumental. The close of November saw excellent performances of standard works given by the principal choral societies. The Musical Union (Dr. Coward), in the "Creation"; the Choral Union (Mr. Suckley), in Verdi's opera "Ernani"; and the St. Cecilia Musical Society (Mr. W. Brown), also in the "Creation," have all given evidence oft hat abundant enthusiasm and plentiful supply of good vocal material which have led the supporters of the Festival scheme to foster ambitious hopes as to the future of South Yorkshire choral singing. But during December the orchestral societies have had their turn. The Collegiate Orchestral Society, directed by Mr. Suckley, led off on the 9th ult. by a capital performance of Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony. The programme also included Mozart's "Magic Flute" and Weber's "Euryanthe' Overtures and a descriptive Suite by Godard. Mrs. W. St. Quentin Leng and Mr. Clarence Booker were the vocalists. On the following night the Amateur Instrumental Society, under Dr. Coward, gave a capital Concert, playing Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and Overtures by Schubert and Ambroise Thomas. Miss M. L. Booker and Miss Hunt sang ballads.

On the 16th ult. the Brincliffe Instrumental Society opened its season with a Subscription Concert, under Mr. W. Peasegood. Beethoven's No. 2 Symphony was the chief piece on the programme.

A Violin and Pianoforte Recital, by Messrs. George and Bromley Booth, attracted a large audience to the Erard Rooms on the 3rd ult. Two Concerts given by the band of the First Life Guards, under Mr. Charles Harvey's management, and an Organ Recital in the Albert Hall by Mr. Guilmant, may also be mentioned among the interesting events of the month.

During Advent selections from "The Messiah" have been given on Sunday evenings at St. Mary's Church, under the direction of Mr. J. A. Rodgers.

The second Harrison Concert was given on the 13th ult. Among the party were Miss Nikita, Mr. Santley, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. David Popper.

Mr. Frederick Dawson gave a Pianoforte Recital at the Press Club on the 21st ult.

A large number of "Messiah" performances were announced for Christmas Day. The Empire, Royal, and City Theatres were all utilised, as were also the Montgomery and Surrey Street Music Halls.

Costa's "Eli" was performed by the Amateur Musical Society, on the 17th ult., under the able direction of Mr. Schollhammer. The principals were Miss Annie Norledge, Miss Rina Robinson, Mr. Otto Dene, Mr. Joseph Lycett, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. Mr. John Peck led the band and Mr. J. W. Phillips was organist. The fine chorus-singing of the Society has won for it an extensive reputation, and in "Eli" the members had exceptional opportunities of displaying enhanced excellence. In all respects the singing of the choir evidenced an advance on previous efforts. The balance of tone, too, is improved this season, and with a few more additions to the tenor department the requisite balance of the parts will be attained.

The Doncaster Musical Society performed "The Messiah" on the 17th ult., in the Corn Exchange. Mr. H. McKenzie conducted.

The Sheffield Choral Union announces Sullivan's "Golden Legend" for its Spring Concert. This beautiful work had not been heard in Sheffield for several years, and its selection should have a good effect on the Society's subscription list.

The Barnsley St. Cecilia Society performed "The Messiah" on the 19th ult., under the direction of Mr. Alfred Benton, of Leeds.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTHERN COUNTIES.

An excellent Concert of Chamber Music, which it is hoped will prove to be the first of a series, was given at the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on the 4th ult., by Miss Aylward and Mr. F. L. Bartlett. The Concert-givers were assisted in the instrumental department by Mr. Prosper Burnett, and Mr. Watkin Mills was the vocalist. A well-arranged programme included Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in C minor (Op. 1, No. 3) and Mendelssohn's Trio (Op. 66) in the same key, both of which were admirably played. Miss Aylward, Mr. Bartlett, and Mr. Prosper Burnett each contributed solos, which were greatly appreciated, as were also Mr. Watkin Mills's songs.

A performance of Spohr's "Last Judgment" was given in the Cathedral, according to long-established custom, on Tuesday, the 10th ult. The solos were sung by members of the choir, and the work received an impressive rendering. Mr. South's accompaniments on the organ were once more a special feature.

The Trowbridge Musical Union and its excellent conductor, Mr. H. Millington, are to be congratulated upon the success of "The Messiah" Concert, which took place in the Town Hall, Trowbridge, on the 10th ult. Miss Ethel Winn, Miss Bessie Elliott, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Adolph Fowler were the solo vocalists, and the orchestra was led by Messrs. Duys and Millington.

Bournemouth has been well occupied with musical concerns during the past month. On the 3rd ult., Madame Albani, supported by a strong party of vocalists and instrumentalists, appeared at the Theatre before a crowded audience; and on the 7th ult. Miss Craigie Ross gave her annual morning Concert, being assisted by Miss Hirtzel and Mr. Herbert Thorndike (vocalists), and Mr. Hans Wessely (solo violinist). On the 12th ult. Madame Newling's Ladies' Choir performed Abt's cantata "Minster Bells" and a miscellaneous selection of part-songs, at the Shaftesbury Hall, in aid of the funds of the Firs Home. Several pupils of Madame Newling appeared and gave evidence of commendable skill. Violin solos were also contributed by Mr. Charles Fletcher, and the Concert-giver was heard in some excellently rendered songs. A successful performance of Mr. Myles B. Foster's cantata "Cinderella" was given in the Assembly Rooms, Boscombe, on the 6th ult., by the pupils of Knole Hall College, in aid of Dr. Barnardo's Homes. The cantata was accompanied by an efficient orchestra, largely composed of pupils of the College, under the direction of Mr. Quinton. Conspicuous amongst the other events of the month was Herr Rosenthal's Pianoforte Recital, announced to take place at the New Town Hall, Bournemouth, on the 20th ult.

The Southampton Philharmonic Society is to be congratulated upon its activity. The second Concert of the season was given at the Philharmonic Hall, on Tuesday, the 17th ult., when "The Messiah" was performed under the conductorship of Mr. H. M. Pike. Gaul's cantata, "Joan of Arc," was given by the members of the St. Matthew's Choral Society, on the 9th ult.

An interesting Concert took place at the Temperance Hall, Romsey, on the 4th ult., when selections from "The Messiah," the "Creation," and "St. Paul" were given, under the conductorship of Mr. Moss. The orchestra, which played the Overture to "The Messiah," besides the accompaniments, was led by Mr. E. Tuck; and Miss A. Tuck presided at the pianoforte.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Leeds has been, in musical matters, unusually busy during the past month. Taking up the thread of our record where it was dropped a month ago, Herr Rosenthal's Pianoforte Recital, on November 21, need be only briefly chronicled. His startling technical powers were well illustrated in a programme of the usual type, and his reticence in a Beethoven Sonata (the "Appassionata") deserves especial commendation because it was hardly so expected. On November 26 the Leeds Symphony Society, which during the five years of its existence has done some good work, gave an interesting Concert. Gade's Third Symphony in A minor was the chief thing played, and, considering that the orchestra consists almost entirely of amateurs, was most creditably performed under Mr. Gutfeld's direction. The vocalist was Mrs. A. W. Schüddekopf, a lady amateur, who sang some well chosen songs most artistically. On the 4th ult. the Leeds Subscription Concert season was begun. The Hallé band, conducted by Sir A. C. Mackenzie, was heard in a programme that was more exclusively "classical" than was intended, for the least familiar work, Tschaïkowsky's F minor Symphony, had to be omitted on account of insufficient opportunity for rehearsal, and that household word of music, the C minor of Beethoven, substituted. Despite this drawback, the Concert was a brilliant success, and Dr. Mackenzie's abilities as a conductor were warmly recognised. Mr. Brodsky, the new leader of the Hallé band, made a most favourable impression on his first appearance before a Leeds audience by his highly poetic and technically perfect playing of the Mendelssohn Concerto, and Madame Marian McKenzie contributed several songs with good effect. For many years past it has been the custom at the Leeds Parish Church to mark some of the more important ecclesiastical seasons by special musical services. On no such occasion, however, has a greater success been achieved than at the Advent Service on the 5th ult., when Brahms's "German Requiem" was given by a large chorus, a complete orchestra, and with Madame Henson and Mr. Browning as soloists. Mr. Benton, the organist, was the conductor. Not only was the artistic result admirable, but the power and impressiveness of the music can seldom have been more strongly felt. It is certainly encouraging to find that this great work is becoming better appreciated every year at Leeds. At a second Advent Service, on the 12th ult., the "Last Judgment" of Spohr was given, but without an orchestra, its place being filled at the organ as efficiently as it could be by Mr. G. R. Sinclair, the organist of Hereford Cathedral. On the 14th ult. a Choral Contest was held, under the management of the Leeds Prize Musical Union, in the Town Hall. The singing was good, that of the male-voice choirs being of singular excellence. In this class the prizes went to the Nelson Excelsior Glee Union, the Harrogate Glee Society, and the Apollo Choir of Middlesbrough, the Reedyford Glee Union being only one point behind. The prizes for mixed choirs were won by the Batley Vocal Union, the Armley Choral Society, and the Mill Hill Chapel Choir. The judges were Messrs. Alfred Benton, of Leeds; W. H. Garland, of Halifax; and J. E. Ibeson, of Huddersfield.

At Bradford, too, there has been more than ordinary musical activity. On November 22 the second of the Subscription Concerts took place, a miscellaneous programme of much more than average interest being sustained by Miss Esther Palliser, Madame Marian McKenzie, Messrs. Ben Davies and Douglas Powell, with Herr Rosenthal as pianist and Mr. W. H. Squire as violoncellist. The third Concert, on the 13th ult., was of weightier calibre, the programme consisting of two choral works, "Acis and Galatea" and the late Goring Thomas's "Swan and the Skylark." Both were well done under Professor Stanford's able and artistic conductorship, the modern work having its characteristic grace and charm well brought out. The chorus was that of the Bradford Festival Choral Society, who sang admirably, the sopranos being especially fine. The Manchester band was responsible for the instrumental part of the performance, and the soloists were Madame Duma, Miss Clara Butt, Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Henry Piercy, and Andrew Black. Certainly, the "Swan and the Skylark," light as it is, bears, nay, gains upon a second hearing. On the 2nd ult. Mr. E. German visited Bradford to conduct, at one of the Concerts given by the Permanent Orchestra, several of his compositions. In every respect the result was most successful. The music exactly suited the band, which, conducted with exceptional ability by Mr. German, has never been heard to more advantage. Mr. Bartle, the Society's conductor, appeared as solo pianist, and played a Hungarian Rhapsody for pianoforte and orchestra with distinction. The vocalist was Miss Jessie Scott. During the month two very enjoyable Concerts have been given by local musicians. On November 25 Mr. S. Midgley gave a Concert of violin and pianoforte music, with a chorus of twelve ladies, trained by Mrs. Midgley, to give variety. Mr. John Dunn played Spohr's "Dramatic" Concerto in really masterly fashion, and joined the Concert-giver in Sonatas for violin and pianoforte by Grieg and Beethoven, the latter being represented by the "Kreutzer." Mr. Dunn was also the chief figure in the Concert given on the 9th ult. by Mr. J. H. Earnshaw, a Bradford pianist, at which Miss B. Rigg was the vocalist. Mr. Earnshaw's taste was shown in the unconventional series of pianoforte pieces he played, and his ability in their interpretation.

At Huddersfield there has been a lull. The Subscription Concerts have consisted of a Conversazione and an Organ Concert, at which Mr. Guilmant appeared and played, among other things, Handel's Seventh Concerto in B flat and his own First Symphony for organ and orchestra, the latter being supplied by the very efficient local Philharmonic band, of which Mr. J. E. Ibeson is the able conductor. Miss Hannah Jones was the vocalist. The newly established Subscription Concerts at Halifax bid fair to be as successful as they deserve. On the 11th ult. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel gave one of their delightful Vocal Recitals, an entertainment that deserved to be styled perfection. On the 3rd ult. a Chamber Concert was given at Halifax by Mr. Herman van Dÿk. The chief piece was Brahms's Pianoforte Trio in E flat (Op. 40), in which the Concert-giver was assisted by Miss Simpkin (violin) and Mr. Schrumpf (violoncello). Mrs. van Dÿk was the vocalist.

In the spacious Parish Church of Holy Trinity, Hull, a Choir Festival took place on November 21. In the afternoon Purcell's Te Deum formed a fitting tribute to the memory of England's greatest master, and was followed by the "Hymn of Praise." In the evening Handel's "Occasional" Overture and "Israel in Egypt" formed the programme. The chorus was good, the band less satisfactory, but the performances were, for a first attempt, so successful that similar functions may be confidently expected in the future. The soloists were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Marian McKenzie, Messrs. H. Grover and Alan Turner; and Mr. F. Bentley, the organist of the church, was the conductor. Under Mr. Kilburn's active rule the Middlesbrough Musical Union is one of the most enterprising of Yorkshire Societies. On the 21st ult. it gave a Wagner Concert, the excessive modernity of which was tempered by a Purcell anthem, introduced to celebrate the day. The Holy Grail scene from the first act of "Parsifal" and extracts from "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin" were among the more striking things in an unusually advanced and interesting programme. Miss Palliser and Mr. Bispham were very successful as the principals. On the following day the Harrogate St. Cecilia Society gave a Concert, Mr. Gaul's "Holy City" and a miscellaneous second part forming the programme. Miss Rhodes, Miss Wilby, Messrs. T. Child and Knowles were the chief singers; and Mr. Sidney Jones was the conductor. The Keighley Musical Union, on the 3rd ult., had distinction conferred upon it by the presence of Professor Prout, who conducted a creditable performance of his cantata "Hereward," the chorus-singing being decidedly its finest feature. The soloists, Madame Haworth, Miss Nelson, Messrs. Green and Owens, were fairly efficient, if not quite equal to the occasion. On the 10th ult. the Batley Choral Society gave, under Mr. Bowling's conductorship, "Judas Maccabæus," and on the same evening Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" formed the chief part of a Concert given by the Armley Choral Society, with Mr. Harrison as conductor. The Ripon Choral Society, of which the Rev. F. H. Taylor is the hon. conductor, gave Gade's "Psyche" and Bennett's "May Queen" with success, on the 12th ult., Miss A. Jackson, Mrs. Burrell, Messrs. Mace and Thornton being the soloists. "St. Paul" was the work chosen by the Morley Choral Society for its Concert on the 11th ult., Mr. Benton conducting; and Professor Stanford's "Revenge," with a portion of the "Creation," formed the programme of the Wakefield Choral Society's Concert on the 13th ult., which was conducted by Mr. J. N. Hardy.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

So much activity is being displayed on the part of the conductors of our great orchestral concerts that they may be said to absorb the chief interest of the musical season, relegating the events of the lyrical stage merely to a secondary place. At the present moment we are provided with no less than six grand orchestras, every one of them giving concert performances on Sundays, and at the same hour; and there being invariably some novelty included in the programmes, the difficulty is to know how to attend them all.

The Lamoureux Concert of November 24 proved to be particularly interesting, including as it did the first performance of the "Chansons de Miarka" of M. Alexandre Georges, set to the poetry of M. Richepin. The series of melodies has already been referred to in The Musical Times as one of the best amongst those which have been published of late years, and the audience fully endorsed that verdict. Madame Passama sang the "Nuages" with much charm and poetic feeling. She also gave a good interpretation of the "Hymne au Soleil," without, however, causing us to forget Madame Collier's fine rendering of this number at the Société de Musique d'Ensemble, and at the Bodinière. The same Concert brought a first hearing of three pieces for organ and orchestra from the pen of M. Guilmant; very well written indeed, but of a character more suitable for performance in the church than the concert-room. The second of the pieces, entitled "Adoration," was more especially applauded. Of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony it would be scarcely necessary to speak, but for the fact of M. Lamoreux having treated us to an interpretation of such admirable perfection as to demand at least a word of acknowledgment. The Concert of the 1st ult. presented the first performance of an Overture, "Bérénice," by M. Silver, a recent Prix de Rome. The work denotes the earnest student, without as yet showing any very pronounced individuality. On the 8th ult. we heard the "Elégie" for violoncello of M. Fauré, finely played by M. Salmon; the piece is very well known in its original form—viz., for pianoforte and violoncello. We may also mention the Funeral Dirge and final scene from "Götterdämmerung," in which both the vocalist, Mdlle. Marcy, and the orchestra were greatly applauded.

M. Colonne's Concert, on November 24, included an interesting novelty in the "Trois Poèmes," by M. Charpentier, one of the most conspicuous of our "modern" school of composers. The "Pœme Mystique" (after Manclair), pervaded as it is by intense feeling, obtained a great success; the "Poème d'Amour," albeit less fascinating than the former, was likewise much appreciated. As to the "Poème réaliste" (after Verlaine), it is intended to represent the medley produced by the number of different instruments which disport themselves at a country fête. The composer does not appear, however, to have deduced from his subject an artistic impression sufficiently clear to communicate itself to his audience, and the significance of the work has been much discussed. The principal novelty of the Concert on the 1st ult. was "La Naissance de Venus," scène mythologique, by M. Paul Collin, set to music by M. G. Fauré, an important work carefully scored, but wanting in the charm to which this graceful composer has accustomed us. A certain frigidity pervades the solo portions, somewhat relieved, it is true, by the sonority of the choruses. The excerpts from "Rheingold," at the same Concert, were a great success. In the Concert of the 8th ult. Madame Kutschera, a German singer, achieved a conspicuous success with Wagner's "Träume," while M. Colonne himself was the recipient of much applause in the performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, which is to be repeated at several of the succeeding Concerts.

The Société des Concerts du Conservatoire gave its first Concert of the season (the sixty-ninth since its foundation) on the 8th ult. Unlike its contemporaries in this capital, this Institution does not appear to be a prey to the feverish hankering after first performances, and there figured in its programme Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in A, played by M. Saint-Saëns, whose "La Lyre et la Harpe" was likewise performed on this occasion, a work too well known to require special comment.

Always interesting and animated, the Concerts Harcourt, in their sixth performance of the season, gave, amongst other numbers, Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," composed in honour of William I. after the war of 1870. This fact, however, in no way influenced the audience, who, finding the piece more noisy than beautiful, bestowed but faint applause.

At the second of the Opéra Concerts we heard a Symphony with organ (No. 3) of M. Widor, a fine work, for the perfect interpretation of which, however, the organ of the Opéra proved scarcely powerful enough. M. Erlanger, a Prix de Rome of 1888, conducted some portions from his opera "Saint Julien l'Hospitalier." It is the production of an earnest musician, imbued with the most modern doctrines, but making a somewhat exaggerated use of his orchestral resources.

Concerning the Concerts of the Palais d'Hiver, we will only remark that they bid fair ere long to take rank with the above-named leading institutions.

The first performance took place on November 26, at the Opéra Comique, of "Xavière," dramatic idyl in three acts, the libretto by M. Louis Gallet, after the novel by M. Fabre, the music by M. Th. Dubois. The composer is one of our most able professors of harmony, his "Notes et Etudes d'Harmonie" being the worthy completion of the celebrated treatise of Reber. Any production from his pen could not be otherwise than correctly composed, and his present operatic score is manifestly written with a sure hand, and is moreover happily inspired in all those portions where charm of utterance is required, while somewhat deficient in vigour where passion is the theme. The employment by the composer of certain traditional and rather used-up forms may have contributed to produce this impression. However this may be, the fact remains that the work met with a very good reception.

On the 18th ult. "Frédégonde" was produced at the Opéra. It is in five acts, the first three of which are by Guiraud, but orchestrated by M. Dukas, and the last two and the ballet by M. Saint-Saëns. The graceful style of M. Guiraud is little suited to so large a theatre as the Opéra House, and that of M. Saint-Saëns is too individual to blend well with M. Guiraud's numbers. Moreover, M. Gallet in his libretto has failed to convey the rugged grandeur of the mythical period with which the story deals, the result being that the work as a whole failed to arouse any enthusiasm. Mdlle. Breval being unable to sing at the production, owing to indisposition, although she appeared at the final rehearsal, her place was ably filled by Mdlle. Lafargue. Other artists were Madame Heglon and MM. Alvarez, Renaud, Vaguet, and Fournets, all of whom acquitted themselves of their several rôles in a praiseworthy manner.

MUSIC IN BERLIN.

(From a Correspondent.)

The recent production of Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Ivanhoe" at the Berlin Opera House has attracted a certain amount of attention among musicians to the German capital; a brief glance, therefore, at its music and musical institutions will possess an added interest at the present moment.

The Berlin Opera has of late years fallen under a cloud, and those who can recall the golden time when Lucca, Mallinger, Niemann, and Betz were in their prime are apt to shake their heads sorrowfully and to doubt whether the future has any revival of past glory in store.

There is no need for despair, however. The present management is very much on the alert in its endeavours to secure the services of promising singers from every part of the empire, and already a vast improvement is noticeable. Some operas may be seen to better advantage in Berlin than in any other city in the country—I shall take the opportunity presently of particularising.

As is the case in the other music centres of Germany, the Opera in Berlin is subsidised by the State; the opera-goer, therefore, is enabled to secure a comfortable seat at a moderate price, although the ruling prices in Berlin are high, if one compares them with those in vogue at other opera houses in the country. An Englishman, however, would not feel that six shillings was an unreasonable sum to pay for a stall, and if only we in England had a subsidised Opera of our own, who can tell whether Londoners might not flock to it in numbers sufficient to make it worth while to keep it open for nine or ten months in the year.

It is generally believed that in German theatres the singers are engaged for life. In some places this is the case, and the result is that, for the sake of economy, aged persons, of from sixty to seventy, who ought long ago to have been put on the retired list, are let loose upon an unoffending public, which has to exercise a considerable amount of imagination in picturing to itself what the, now pathetically feeble, voices must once have been. In Berlin, by a sensible regulation, the artists are engaged for a term of five years, and by this means a constant accession of fresh talent is possible. I have but little doubt that, in a few years, the Berlin Opera will once more be the first in the land. Among impending engagements may be mentioned that of Fräulein Ternina, of Munich, by many considered the finest soprano in Germany, and of Herr Kraus, a young tenor from Mannheim, who possesses, in addition to a beautiful voice, a fine stage presence, though he still has a good deal to learn. Space will only admit of a brief reference to a few of the leading artists now singing in Berlin, amongst whom Frau Sucher stands pre-eminent. Her voice, naturally, has lost its youthful freshness, but it is still magnificent in quality, and in such rôles as Isolde or Brünnhilde she is able to excite the wildest enthusiasm among her audience—in these two parts, indeed, she is probably unapproachable, as her acting in the dramas of Wagner is magnetic and unequalled by any actress now before the public; those who have seen her inspired Kundry at Bayreuth will bear me out in this. Berlin possesses quite a number of excellent light sopranos, but in heroic opera only two other names are worthy of mention, Frau Goetze and Fräulein Hiedler. The latter has no claim to be considered other than mediocre; she has a pleasant voice, and, when at her best, sings with a certain amount of distinction. Unhappily, her intonation is frequently at fault, and though she sometimes leaves little to be desired in her rendering of a part, one is never sure, from one night to another, whether she will sing in tune. Frau Goetze is a much safer singer, and a splendid actress; she shows to great advantage in such parts as Ortrud in "Lohengrin" and Brangäne in "Tristan," but in essaying lighter rôles, such as Carmen, she is often hopelessly at sea.

Berlin is sadly in need of a really fine tenor, and, as I have hinted above, attempts are being made to secure one. Herr Gudehus had, some years ago, a considerable reputation, but neither he nor Herr Sylva, who now sing the leading heroic parts, can be considered more than third-rate, and as their appearance is not very much in their favour, it is obvious that new blood is required. Fortunately the Berlin audiences are not restricted to these two singers, as tenors from other opera houses not unfrequently come on starring visits to the German metropolis. In the matter of baritones and basses, Berlin is well represented, and among these must be mentioned Betz, Bulss, and Stammer. Betz is an old man now, of course, but his voice is still a pleasure to listen to, and he remains, as he always was, an ideal Hans Sachs. Notwithstanding his years, he has created several new rôles quite recently, one or two of them with marked success; I refer more particularly to his Falstaff, which is in every respect an excellent performance.

The orchestra has, during the past few years, been very much improved, and there is a first-rate staff of conductors, of whom, perhaps, Dr. Muck is the best.

An agreeable feature of the management is the care given to the production of a new work or the revival of an old one. For the revival, last spring, of "Rienzi," an immense amount was spent on the magnificent and very realistic new scenery, and great pains were taken to give the work in its original form, including the Pantomime in the second act, which it has been the custom recently to cut out. I have said that certain operas are better given in Berlin than elsewhere, and as a case in point I may mention Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel." As the two children, it would be impossible to find a better pair than Fräulein Rothauser and Fräulein Dietrich, each of whom possesses a charming voice and a wonderful fund of humour in acting. Each of the other parts, too, has a capable exponent, and there is a finish about the whole performance which it would be hard to match.

Having dealt at some length with the Opera, it is now time to say something of the Philharmonic, where the popular orchestral concerts are held. The members of the orchestra, which is the best in Berlin, receive a fixed salary, and concerts take place, from October to May, every Sunday, Tuesday, and Wednesday. On Sunday the admission is one shilling, on the other days a fine concert may be heard for seventy-five pfennigs, or ninepence; indeed, by purchasing a dozen tickets, it works out at sixpence a concert. It is no wonder that these concerts are well attended, and it is often hard to find two seats together on a Beethoven or Wagner evening, although the hall is very large. The Englishman on first entering the Philharmonic will probably be astonished to see, in place of the well-ordered rows of seats at home, a multitude of small tables with four or five chairs round each, and beer very much in evidence: I feel convinced, however, that before long he will have come to the conclusion that it is far the most comfortable way of enjoying a concert, and as no refreshments are served during the performance of a piece, the music is not disturbed in any way. There are, however, ten special concerts every winter, when the seats are arranged in the orthodox manner; these concerts correspond in some way to our Philharmonic Concerts, and a renowned conductor is especially engaged for them. For many years Von Bülow held the post, and considerably enhanced the fame of the orchestra. It is well known that under his direction the concerts were marked by many curious incidents, and one evening the programme contained nothing but Beethoven's Choral Symphony, which was performed twice in order that the audience might understand it better. Herr Nikisch is the present conductor of these concerts.

Another important Institution is the Singakademie, which was founded in 1791, with the object of promoting the practice of sacred music. It is now used for all manner of concerts, but a choral society is still working in connection with it, and important works are performed every year, including Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion, which is sung every Good Friday.

Then there is the Bechstein Saal, which is similar to the Steinway Hall in London, and is used principally for vocal recitals.

Celebrated artists from every part of the world give concerts at one or other of these halls, and of late there has been an increasing tendency to welcome English performers.

I have by no means exhausted the list of Berlin's musical attractions, for there are several important choral and orchestral societies which I have not yet mentioned, and of which I may name the Wagner-Verein and the Stern'sch-Verein, the latter being under the direction of Professor Friedrich Gernsheim.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

The opening of the opera season in New York was most successfully accomplished by a brilliant performance of Gounod's "Romeo et Juliette," and the high standard of excellence then set has been kept up without flagging through all the performances that have followed. Of the old favourites who have returned it is not necessary to say anything. The present company includes several newcomers who have, in nearly all cases, fulfilled expectations. Of the novelties presented, "Hamlet" has been decidedly the most important, since it served to introduce Madame Calvé as Ophelia. Her success was marked and instantaneous. All the orchestral concerts (and there are a great number of them) are fairly under way. Since last writing Mr. Franz Ondricek and Mr. Achille Rivarde have made their respective bows as violinists, and both seem to be well launched on the wave of prosperity. Possibly Mr. Rivarde, on account of his youth and the fact that he owes a sort of allegiance to New York, has secured the greater success of the two. In the field of pianoforte playing Mr. Paderewski of course occupies the larger share of the horizon—in fact, about all of it; and his "Polish Fantasia" is in great demand. A series of Orchestral Concerts is being given at the new Olympia Music Hall. A new organisation, to be known as the Metropolitan Permanent Orchestra, has just been incorporated under the laws of the State of New York. This orchestra is intended to be somewhat different from any which has preceded it. It has no large guarantee fund behind it, nor does it appeal for the support of wealthy patrons. There are to be no stockholders except the musicians who play in it. Of these there will be fifty—possibly more. It is expected that Mr. Seidl will be the conductor, and as the players who have thus banded themselves together are men of the highest professional ability, it would seem as though the claim it makes—that it will give only Concerts of the very highest class—is not an empty one. All profits are to be divided pro rata among the members.

Among the choral societies Mr. Damrosch's chorus came first in the field with Handel's "L'Allegro." Owing to the absence of his brother with the German Opera Company, this work was conducted by Mr. Frank Damrosch. In performance it was unexceptionable, but the work itself, which has very rarely been given in this country, possibly never in New York before, failed to excite any interest. The New York Musical Society rather unwisely engaged Mr. Paderewski as the soloist at its first Concert, in place of Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, who was first announced. The pianist so completely overshadowed the Society that the audience seemed to have little patience left after he had finished his numbers, and some really good work (bestowed on Saint-Saëns's "Deluge" and Chadwick's "Lily Nymph") went completely to waste. In church music an event of some importance has been the opening of the new church of St. Mary the Virgin, a very handsome and spacious edifice which has just been finished and consecrated. The church has for years maintained a ritual of the most advanced "Catholic" type known or allowed within the Episcopal communion. Its services in its old building, though hampered by want of room and proper facilities, always attracted large numbers of people fond of the most ornate and showy style of ecclesiastical music imaginable. Almost the entire répertoire of the choir is in manuscript, consisting of adaptations from the Masses of the French and Belgian schools, with a liberal sprinkling of those of Mozart and Haydn. In its new habitation the choir of St. Mary's changes from one of boys and men, supported by a few female voices, to a complete chancel choir for the plain-song work, and another complete quartet and chorus in the West gallery for the music in anthem form. The two bodies are accompanied by a divided electric organ, one part being situated near to each chorus, and a small orchestra.

A new Choral Society has been started in Brooklyn, under the leadership of Mr. Charles B. Hawley, who is the solo bass and leader of the choir of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York. Mr. Dudley Buck, who is organist of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, has just published a cantata of some size, for Advent and Christmas, entitled "The Coming of the King," which bids fair to win considerable distinction as a work for church performance.

The most important musical event to record in Philadelphia is the opening of the opera season, under Mr. Gustav Hinrichs, a conductor who has done a great deal for music in Philadelphia.

With the ultimate object of establishing a guarantee fund for a permanent orchestra, a series of weekly Symphony Concerts has been inaugurated in Philadelphia. A recent programme contained Berlioz's "King Lear" Overture, a Concertstück by Hans Sitt, and what one of the local dailies calls Mozart's "Juniper" Symphony, a work which he says is "the ne plus ultra of human art."

From Chicago comes the news of the very great success of the season of German Opera performances given there under Mr. Walter Damrosch. The receipts were 60,000 dollars, and the press united in declaring Frau Klafsky the greatest Fidelio and Ortrud they had ever seen. This company is now farther West, and its return to the East will be signalised by a series of performances beginning in Boston on February 3 (twelve performances). Mr. Damrosch has included his own setting of Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter" in the company's répertoire, so that this work, which has already been heard in part in New York as an oratorio, will have an opportunity to appear in its proper dress as an opera. Opinions are considerably divided as to its merits.

The Concert troupe of which Madame Melba is the most conspicuous figure is touring through the West. At last accounts they had made a very satisfactory "stand" at Minneapolis.

Mr. B. Luard Selby gave a Concert, at the Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 16th ult., when the programme consisted largely of his own compositions. These showed him in a very favourable light, more especially a Pianoforte Quintet (No. 1, in F) and a number of songs from Tennyson's "Maud," which latter are full of beautiful, artistic touches, both in the voice parts and the free and full accompaniments. The Quintet is a work of sterling worth, each movement, but more especially the highly impressive Adagio—one long stream of fine, deeply-felt melody—and the remarkably spontaneous Finale, displaying the priceless gift of melody in a marked degree, while in all four movements the workmanship is such as to closely rivet the listener's attention. The Quintet is certainly a work deserving frequent hearings, and it creates a desire to know more of Mr. Selby's Chamber music. We cared less for some of his settings of a number of pastoral lyrics, though they also showed refined taste and a laudable avoidance of the nondescript English Ballad style. Mr. Selby was assisted by several excellent singers—e.g., Mr. Walter Ford, who sang some lovely lyrics by Schumann, Grieg, and Brahms, as well as the above-named songs from "Maud," with the utmost refinement and clearness of enunciation; Mr. Kennerley Rumford, whose sonorous, well-trained baritone, allied to an expressive style, gave full effect to Brahms's exquisite "Wie bist du, meine Königin," and two fine songs by that foremost of English song-writers, Miss Maude Valérie White, who accompanied. They were Shelley's "To Mary," a tender, expressive composition, and an immensely spirited, original setting of Shakespeare's "Crabbed age and youth," which Mr. Rumford had to repeat. The Misses Eva and Constance Layton sang two Canzonets for two voices by Thomas Morley (dating from 1595) without accompaniment, and Miss Wakefield and Mrs. Mary Davies were the remaining vocalists. The string quartet consisted of Miss Emily Shinner, Messrs. G. W. Collins, Leonard Fowles, and Whitehouse, the first and last-named of whom also played solos.

A meeting was held in the Guildhall, Norwich, on the 11th ult., under the presidency of the Mayor, with the object of promoting a testimonial to be presented to Dr. Edward Bunnett upon his completing fifty years of musical life. The following resolution, moved by Sir Peter Eade, M.D., and seconded by the Sheriff of Norwich, was carried with acclamation: "That a subscription be opened for presenting a testimonial to Dr. Bunnett on his attaining his musical jubilee, and in recognition of the eminent services he has rendered to the art of music, and that such subscription be limited to two guineas." A large influential committee was also appointed to carry into effect the aforesaid resolution, with Mr. F. O. Taylor as honorary secretary. A considerable sum was subscribed in the room, and from the general esteem in which the Doctor is held in Norwich and the district the amount forthcoming should be considerable. It is pleasant to find all the local professors' names on the committee, and also several of those residing farther afield. Dr. Bunnett has not only done much to foster the love of music amongst his immediate neighbours, but by his compositions for the Church has contributed a help to divine worship which has been useful to thousands. He has also been a leading member of the Incorporated Society of Musicians since the establishment of that important body, and we have no doubt many of those outside friends will gladly avail themselves of the present opportunity of showing their respect and esteem for one so generally popular. Any donations sent to the office of this journal will be forwarded to the proper quarter.

A striking testimony of the good work being done by Mr. C. H. Allen Gill at the People's Palace was adduced on the 7th ult., when a most praiseworthy performance was given, in the fine hall of the Institution, of Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The chorus-singing showed marked improvement since the interpretation of the oratorio here last year, and the same may be said of the orchestra, which, with few exceptions, was, in common with the choir, entirely composed of members of the music classes under Mr. Gill's direction. Such a performance, listened to as it was by a most appreciative audience of upwards of 5,000, is most satisfactory, for it implies many hours of enjoyment of the art in homes where the pleasures of life are none too frequent. It should be added that Mr. R. E. Miles was an excellent exponent of the Prophet, whose music he sang with due dignity and fervour; and that the other solo parts were effectively rendered by Madame Isabel George, Miss Hannah Jones, and Mr. Joseph O'Mara, who were ably assisted by Miss Ella Johnston, Miss L. Roberts, Mr. Gwilym Richards, and Mr. Ben Grove. Mr. B. Jackson presided at the organ with skill and excellent judgment. At the next Concert, on the 18th inst., Mackenzie's "Dream of Jubal" will be performed.

Mr. Frank Davey gave his seventh annual Concert in St. Mary's Hall, Chislehurst, on November 26, when an interesting programme attracted a large audience. The chief concerted piece was Saint-Saëns's fascinating Pianoforte Trio in F (Op. 18), which was excellently played by Miss Isabella Donkersley, Mr. Frederick Casano, and Mr. Davey. In Schumann's Phantasiestücke (Op. 12) the Concert-giver proved himself a pianist who combines a cultured taste with a highly developed technique, his performances lacking neither power nor refinement. Miss Donkersley was most successful in the late Friedrich Kiel's fine but difficult Solostück for violin (Op. 70, No. 1), her artistic and brilliant playing fully meriting the spontaneous applause of an otherwise strangely cold audience. Miss Florence Oliver displayed her fine, well-trained voice, as well as her linguistic accomplishments, by her impassioned singing of four songs by Gounod, Schumann, Schubert, and Francesco Rossi. Beethoven's Sonata in A for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 69), played by Messrs. Davey and Casano, completed the programme.

Mr. Brunton Steel, a reciter of considerable promise, gave an entertainment at Steinway Hall on November 28, at which he was heard in no less than six of the remarkable series of recitations with music composed by Mr. Stanley Hawley, already spoken of in these columns when they were first brought forward by Mr. Charles Fry. Mr. Steel showed so much ability in the only two pieces without music that figured in the programme, that competent judges regretted he had not confined his efforts to works of this kind. Mr. Hawley's settings stand, as we have previously remarked, quite alone; they are a union—an intimate union of two arts, and this Mr. Steel unfortunately quite failed to realize. He delivered "The Bells," "The Raven," "Riding through the Broom," &c., in a manner and in a tone of voice that would have been excellent without the pianoforte, but which, as it was, made the pianoforte appear neither more nor less than a nuisance. We had two arts interfering with one another, instead of blending. It was regrettable, because, when recited in the right tone of voice, Mr. Hawley's settings come out admirably.

The first of Mr. David Bispham's series of three Concerts, at St. James's Hall, was given on the 10th ult., when the performance proved of unique interest. The programme was entirely drawn from writers of past centuries, and the music was excellently rendered on fine specimens of the instruments for which it was written. The instrumental works included a Suite by Marin Marais (A.D. 1656-1728) for viola da gamba, accompanied by harpsichord; and a Concerto (the second) for harpsichord, viola d'amore, and viola da gamba, the executants of which were Mr. and Miss Dolmetsch, and Mr. Fuller Maitland. Chief interest, however, was manifested in the vocal portion of the selection, which Mrs. Hutchinson and Mr. David Bispham interpreted with delightful appreciation of the old-world spirit of the text. The lyrical composers drawn upon included Henry Purcell, the brothers Henry and William Lawes, Lanière and John Jenkins; and a feature of the occasion was the artistically printed book of words, the very necessary historical and analytical notes in which were provided by Mr. Edgar F. Jacques.

Madame Albani's command of various styles was displayed at her Concert in Queen's Hall, on the 9th ult. Opera was represented by "Souvenir dei miei prim' anni" (Hérold's "Pré aux Clercs") and "The flowers are gleaming" (Cowen's "Harold"), sacred airs by the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria," and ballads by "Home, sweet home." The prima donna, who sang with her usual fervour, also joined Miss Clara Butt in "Quis est homo" (Rossini's "Stabat Mater") and "La luna immobile" ("Mefistofele"). Mr. Edward Lloyd was as successful as ever in Piatti's "Awake" and "Come, Margarita, come" ("Martyr of Antioch"). Mr. Norman Salmond was the remaining singer, and the instrumentalists were MM. Johannes Wolff, Pugno, and Hollman. The latter introduced two charming violoncello pieces, "Cantilène" and "Légende Espagnole," by Mr. Arthur Hervey, who may be complimented upon producing compositions that, whilst certain to please all sections of the musical public, are grateful to the executant. These novelties were exceedingly well received.

The Temperance Choral Society, which was founded in 1877, showed capacity for excellent work on the 16th ult., at St. Martin's Town Hall. Mr. Frederick Williams, the new conductor, proved himself fully qualified for the position he occupied, and there could be no doubt of the zeal of his compact choir, numbering about fifty members. The place of honour in the programme was assigned to Gounod's impressive Motet "Gallia," the choral parts of which were steadily rendered, whilst the solos were expressively given by Madame Bessie Webber. Several of Purcell's compositions figured in the second part, including "I attempt from love's sickness" (sung by Mr. F. Williams) and the chorus "In these delightful." Mrs. Furse and Mr. Edgar Hawthorn assisted with solos, and at the pianoforte and harmonium were Messrs. F. W. Hastings and Sydney Baynes respectively.

MADAME JOSEPHINE CHATTERTON, a harpist of considerable ability, who has returned to England after filling the position of director of the Harp College in Chicago, gave a Concert at the Criterion Theatre, on the 12th ult. For solos the harp is not a particularly telling instrument, but in pieces by Parish Alvars, Felix Godefroid, Bochsa, John Thomas, and her deceased father, Frederick Chatterton, who wrote his fantasia "Erin" expressly for her, Madame Chatterton proved the possession of taste as well as of executive facility. The Bernhard Carrodus String Quartet party effectively played two movements of Beethoven's Op. 18, No. 4, and Madame Amy Sherwin distinguished herself by a brilliant rendering of the "Couplets du Mysoli," from David's "La Perle du Brésil." Other contributors were Mr. Reginald Brophy, Mr. H. Winfred Goff, the Westminster Singers, and the Columbians Quartet.

MISS FANNY DAVIES met with a most flattering reception on her recent visit to Vienna, where she appeared in one of the Philharmonic Concerts, at a Chamber Concert given by the Rosé Quartet Party, and also gave a Recital of her own. Referring to her interpretation of the pianoforte part of Brahms's Quartet in G minor, the Neue Musikalische Presse says: "The audience soon felt convinced that it had to deal here with an artist of the first order. Seldom, if ever, have the beauties of this composition been brought home to the hearts of the hearers more convincingly and triumphantly than on this occasion." And again, in reference to the lady's Recital: "Her interpretation of Schumann's F sharp minor Sonata was one of the pearls of the evening. The instrument sang again under her sympathetic touch like a beautiful human voice."

THE Bernhard Carrodus String Quartet gave the last of a series of three Chamber Concerts on the 5th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall. The programme on this occasion included Mozart's Quartet in D minor, which was played with admirable appreciation of the suave and graceful character of the music; Dvorák's attractive "Bagatellen" (Op. 47), and the Andante in E and Scherzo in A minor from Mendelssohn's "Fragments" (Op. 81). In these works the excellent violin playing of Mr. B. M. Carrodus, who led, was, as at the previous Concerts, specially noticeable. Agreeable features of the evening were the sympathetic manner in which the pianoforte part of Rubinstein's Sonata in D (Op. 18), for that instrument and violoncello, were rendered by Mrs. S. Passmore, and the tasteful singing of Madame Bertha Moore.

MR. RICHARD GOMPERTZ concluded his excellent series of Chamber Concerts at the Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 11th ult., when the programme included Brahms's String Quartet in A minor (Op. 51, No. 2), the Scherzo from Luigi Cherubini's Quartet in E flat, and Tschaïkowsky's attractive Quartet in D (Op. 11). The interpretations of these works was distinguished by an executive finish and unanimity of expression that placed them on a high artistic level, and the skill of Mr. Gompertz as a violinist was specially shown in Tschaïkowsky's Quartet, the eloquent second movement of which was rendered with the utmost expression. The enjoyment of the evening was enhanced by the singing of Mr. Plunket Greene, whose selection of songs included "Through the ivory gate" and "Why so pale and wan," by Dr. Hubert Parry.

THE North-East London Choral Society performed "Judas Maccabæus" at the Shoreditch Tabernacle, Hackney Road, on the 5th ult., in highly creditable fashion. The choir, numbering about 170, was evenly balanced and sang with care and spirit throughout. Among its most notable endeavours was "Hear us, O Lord," the compact rendering of which deserved the applause accorded; Madame Minnie Jones, Miss Cecilia Gray, Miss Rina Robinson, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Alfred Plant were responsible for the solos. The orchestra, of about twenty performers, had as leader Mr. G. Hatley, and Mr. W. Bolton presided at the organ. Mr. John Eyre, the organist of the Tabernacle, conducted with praiseworthy watchfulness.

MISS OLIVE HARCOURT, who has a bright and sympathetic voice of extensive compass, may be complimented on her choice of songs for the Concert at the Hampstead Conservatoire, on the 9th ult. She sang with the requisite refinement the aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro," "Giunse alfin il momento," Schubert's "Sei mir gegrüsst," and Schumann's "Auftrage," besides giving with much effect the "Bell Song" from "Lakmé" and taking part with her sister, Miss Florence Harcourt, in a couple of duets. Mr. Hayden Coffin and Mr. Frederick Rosse were the other vocalists. Mr. Herbert Parsons, a talented pianist, played with marked success Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," a couple of examples of Chopin, and Liszt's brilliant arrangement of Schubert's "Erl-King."

MR. FREDERICK DELMAR received very valuable assistance from Miss Regina de Sales, Mdlle. Adelina de Lara, and Mr. Sydney Brooks at his Concert at Steinway Hall, on the 5th ult. Bemberg's "Nymphes et Sylvains" was given by Miss de Sales with exceptional fluency and grace, and her exertions in Gounod's duet "Barcarola" with Mr. Delmar called forth hearty approval. Mdlle. de Lara, the pianist, played Brahms's Scherzo in E minor with fancy, clearness, and neatness, and Mr. Sydney Brooks executed three violoncello pieces so expressively as to make the audience wish each solo longer. Miss Blanche Ruby exhibited a good voice and style in "Qui la voce" ("Puritani") and a couple of English songs. Miss Rosa Green ably rendered Goring Thomas's "A Summer Night."

AN enjoyable Orchestral Concert was given at the Imperial Institute, on the 18th ult., by the Society conducted by Mr. Albert Randegger. On this occasion the instrumental effects were improved by the players being arranged closer together, and in the form adopted at the recent performance by the Society at Windsor Castle. Many of the pieces selected by the Queen were also repeated at this Concert, amongst them being the Prelude to "Lohengrin," of which a very creditable interpretation was given. Madame Clara Samuell had been engaged as solo vocalist, but owing to this lady's indisposition her place was taken by Miss Lindsay Currie, whose singing was received with much favour by a large audience.

MISS WIGLEY'S Concert at St. Mary's Hall, St. John's Wood, on the 14th ult., included several acceptable pieces, both classical and modern. Madame Frickenhaus played with her accustomed finish Mendelssohn's Caprice (Op. 16) and two other pianoforte compositions. For violin soli Miss Winifred Jones selected Raff's "Cavatina" and a Valse by Peiniger, adequately bringing out the best points of each; and was associated with Miss Bessie Hancock (pianoforte) and Mr. Casano (violoncello) in a Trio by Gurlitt. Miss Wigley's share in the programme was a "Berceuse" by Tschaïkowsky. A number of vocal pieces interspersed the instrumental performances.

A DRAMATIC and Musical Recital was given by Mr. Adrian Harley at the Public Hall, Woodvale, Lordship Lane, on the 10th ult. The Reciter displayed much ability in his various selections, and was especially successful in the Closet scene from "Hamlet," in which he was ably supported by Miss Winifred Grey; this selection was rendered additionally attractive by the introduction of Berthold Tours's melodious music. Another feature of interest was Longfellow's "Norman Baron," with a very effective pianoforte accompaniment by Mr. Norton Wight, given for the first time. Mr. Harley was assisted by Miss Alice Claudet (pianoforte) and Mr. A. Boxall (violin).

THE Bermondsey Settlement Choral and Orchestral Union gave a performance of Handel's "Messiah," on the 5th ult., at the Bermondsey Town Hall. A departure from the ordinary custom was made on this occasion, in that Handel's original version was rendered, and the French diapason normal pitch adopted. This proved to be a great success, the alteration in the pitch being much appreciated by the singers. The solos were given by Miss Ada Loaring, Miss Jessie King, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. Frank Swinford, all of whom acquitted themselves with credit. The band and chorus performed their duties admirably, under the direction of Mr. John E. Borland.

THE students of Trinity College gave an invitation Concert on the 17th ult., at Mandeville Place, which was largely attended. The programme included a Pianoforte Trio in C minor, by Bradbury Turner, which was cleverly played by the Misses Lilly Evans, Edith Evans, and Annie Parsons, and the Adagio and Finale from Max Bruch's Concerto in G minor (Op. 26), the solo part of which served to show Master S. J. Faulks's very promising abilities as a violinist. The most notable vocal endeavours were the renderings by Miss Alice Macfarlane of Meyerbeer's "Nobil Signor," and by Mr. E. A. Thiel of the Toreador's Song from Bizet's "Carmen."

AT the dedication Festival at St. Clement Danes, on November 24, the first of a series of monthly Recitals of sacred music was given after the Evening Service by the organist, Mr. E. P. Delevanti. The choir of the church was augmented to about 100 voices, and sang "And the glory of the Lord," "The heavens are telling," and "Hallelujah." Miss Jessie Delevanti, Miss Edith Snell, and Miss Maude Evans (vocalists), and Mr. Alfred Phasey (trombone) assisted. Mr. Delevanti presided at the organ, which is a very fine old instrument, built by Father Smith in 1690, and restored last year at a cost of £800.

A LECTURE was delivered at the Parochial Hall, Kennington Park Road, at the end of November, by Dr. Jacob Bradford, entitled "Henry Purcell, the great English Musician," dealing with the life and writings of the composer. The illustrations, which included the Te Deum in D, selections from "Dido and Æneas," "Come, if you dare," "Golden Sonata," &c., were rendered by the Newington Choral Society and St. Mary's Choir, Mr. Percy J. Bradford presiding at the pianoforte. The lecturer exhibited an old virginal, dated about 1680.

THE annual social gathering of the Association of North London (Presbyterian) Choirs was held at St. John's Wood on the 14th ult. Dr. E. H. Turpin, who was the guest of the evening, gave a very instructive and interesting address to the assembled choirs, and afterwards rehearsed them in one of his anthems. Mr. F. G. Edwards, honorary secretary of the Association, was presented with a testimonial, in the form of a cheque for £50, in acknowledgment of his services to the cause of music in the Presbyterian Church of England.

A PURCELL Commemoration Concert was given at the New Concert Hall, Blackheath, on the 19th ult. The programme included extracts from "Dido and Æneas," "The Ode to St. Cecilia," three scenes from the "Masque of King Arthur," the "Golden Sonata," &c. The vocalists were Miss Isabel Hearne, Miss Florence Oliver, Mr. Fred. Williams, and Mr. Watkin Mills; and a small string orchestra, with Miss Beatrice Hallett (pianoforte) and choir of about thirty voices, assisted.

AT the Parish Church, Hornsey, Spohr's "Last Judgment" was finely rendered on the 11th ult.; the chorus by a full choir of over sixty voices. The solos, in the hands of Master Sterndale Bennett, Mr. Ernest Taylor, Mr. Harry Stubbs, and Mr. R. E. Miles, left nothing to be desired; the singing of Mr. Miles being worthy of the highest commendation. Mr. Herbert J. Gresham ably presided at the organ, and Mr. Henry J. Baker conducted, as usual.

MR. F. W. HOLLOWAY'S annual Concert was given at Herne Hill on November 28, when he was assisted by Miss Kate Redman, Mr. Arthur Harvey, Mr. J. Bevan, and the Grecian Vocal Quartet. Miss A. M. Holloway gave some violin solos; and duets for two pianofortes, including a Sonata by the Concert-giver, were played by Miss Jessie Hunter and Mr. Holloway. The Sonata was so warmly received that the performers were called upon to repeat the Finale.

THE last of the Purcell Commemorative Concerts was given on the 20th ult., at the Portman Rooms, by Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch, who, assisted by Mr. H. M. Matheson, Mr. W. A. Boxall, Miss Hélène Dolmetsch, and Miss Strachey, played several of the most characteristic works by our national composer. The vocal excerpts, no less interesting, were admirably sung by Mrs. Helen Trust, Mr. William Nicholls, and Mr. Douglas Powell.

THE Civil Service Vocal Union gave a Concert at the King's Hall of the Holborn Restaurant on the 12th ult. A varied selection of part-music was sung by the choir with highly commendable precision and effect. Songs were given by Messrs. Henry Piercy, R. E. Miles, and Arthur Beckwith, and the "Lieder" Quartet contributed vocal pieces in very finished style. Mr. W. H. Squire contributed violoncello solos, and Mr. A. Furse conducted.

ON November 26 the St. Peter's Choral Society, Brockley, commenced its eleventh season, and gave an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," under the direction of Dr. C. J. Frost. The principal vocalists were Madame Wilson Osman, Miss Marie Hooton, Mr. Harry Stubbs, and Mr. Dan Price, the latter deserving special mention for his admirable singing in the part of the Prophet.

MR. F. H. COWEN'S "Rose Maiden" was given by the Putney Orchestral and Choral Society, on the 2nd ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Frank Barnard. The choruses were given with brightness and precision, and the orchestral parts were excellently rendered. The soloists were Miss Bessie Spells, Miss Clara Robson, Mr. S. Masters, and Mr. Gilbert Thorne.

AT St. John's Church, Hammersmith, on November 28, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was sung. The soloists were Master Sterndale Bennett and Mr. J. H Pearson, and the choir of the church was augmented for the occasion. Mr. C. H. Kempling accompanied on the organ, and Mr. Charles G. Sadler, organist and choirmaster of the church, conducted.

SPOHR'S "Last Judgment" was sung at St. James's Church, Paddington, on the 13th ult., with Miss Gertrude Izard, Miss Mary Barratt, Mr. Gilbert Denis, and Mr. Frederick Winton as soloists. The work was performed without a conductor, Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, organist and director of the choir, presiding at the organ.

SPOHR'S "Last Judgment" was given at Christ Church Westminster Bridge Road, on the 2nd, 9th, and 16th ult., by the church choir (augmented), under the conductorship of Mr. J. R. Griffiths. The symphonies and accompaniments were played on the organ by Dr. F. N. Abernethy, organist of St. Saviour's, Southwark.

A CONCERT was given at the School for the Indigent Blind, Southwark, on the 18th ult., under the direction of Mr. Herbert Hodge. The programme included Spohr's "As pants the hart," "Lovely appear" ("Redemption"), and several part-songs and organ solos. The band of the School also assisted.

THE result of the Manchester Sunday School Union Hymn Tune Competition has been announced. A prize of £3 has been awarded to each of the following competitors: Dr. Henry Hiles, Mr. Caleb Simper, Dr. Roland Rogers, and Mr. R. G. Thompson.

ON November 30 Mr. Frank Barnard was presented with a silver-mounted ivory bâton from the members of the Old Church Choir, Chelsea (on his retirement from the office of choirmaster), in recognition of his services.

MR. JOHN W. IVIMEY has been appointed Director of Music at the South-Western Polytechnic Institute, Chelsea.

OBITUARY.

WE have to record the death, on November 25, at Oudenarde, Flanders, of M. EDMOND VAN DER STRAETEN, the distinguished Belgian musical historian, one of the most erudite of European musical savants. Born at Oudenarde, on December 3, 1826, he studied at the Jesuit College of his native town, and at the University of Ghent, and subsequently, at the instigation of Fétis, obtained a post in the Royal Archives, at Brussels. Here every facility was afforded him to institute those researches concerning the glorious musical past of his country which proved to be his life's work, and the most important result of which was his "La Musique aux Pays-Bas"—nine good-sized volumes, the first of which appeared in 1867. Less a connected history than a vast store of more or less valuable documentary evidence from the period of the fourteenth to the sixteenth centuries, this work presents an almost unique monument of the most painstaking research, and will always remain of the utmost value to the student of musical history. During the progress of the work and in connection therewith, Van der Straeten had extended his investigations to France, Germany, Italy, and Spain, at the expense of his Government—a fact to which his valuable monographs "Les Musiciens Néerlandais en Italie" and "Les Musiciens flamands en Espagne" likewise owe their compilation. Amongst other important works from his pen may be instanced "Le Théâtre villageois en Flandre," in four volumes; "Voltaire Musicien," and "'Lohengrin,' instrumentation et philosophie," the latter published in 1879. The deceased was amongst the earliest supporters of Richard Wagner and of the neo-Flemish school of music in Belgium, represented by M. Peter Benoît, and others. He was the composer of a three-act opera, "Le Proscrit," and the musical critic, at one time, of the Echo du Parlement and Le Nord.

The death is announced, on November 11, at Bonn, where for the last five years he had lived in retirement, of Professor Julius Tausch, the highly esteemed Düsseldorf musical director. He was born on April 15, 1827, in Dessau, where he was a pupil of Friedrich Schneider, and also studied at the Leipzig Conservatorium shortly after the foundation of that Institution by Mendelssohn. At the age of twenty he took up his residence as a teacher in Düsseldorf, where he became the conductor of the Liedertafel, and in 1853 succeeded Schumann in the conductorship of the Düsseldorfer Gesang-Verein, which post he occupied until his retirement in 1890. For many years he conducted the Festivals of the Lower Rhine, when held at Düsseldorf, and was also, at one time, the conductor of the Glasgow Orchestral Concerts, in succession to Sir Arthur Sullivan. Tausch was a distinguished pianist and skilful accompanist, and as a composer enjoyed considerable reputation in Germany. His most important compositions are "Miriam's Siegeszug" (first produced at the Lower Rhine Festival of 1887), "Rheinfahrt," and some charming incidental music to "As you like it." He also wrote a quantity of pianoforte works, and his vocal quartets and songs were formerly much in vogue in his native country; some of the latter being indeed the most likely to perpetuate his memory as a composer.

Herr Gustav Jensen, professor of harmony and counterpoint at the Cologne Conservatorium, a contrapuntist of eminence, died at that town on November 26, aged fifty-two. He was a younger brother of Adolf Jensen, the gifted composer of songs, who died in 1879. Gustav was born at Königsberg in 1843, studied composition under Dehn and violin under Laub and Joachim, he being a favourite pupil of the latter. After having been for some years a member of the orchestra of the Stadt-Theater in his native town, Jensen, in 1872, went to Cologne, where he shortly after obtained the professorship at the Conservatorium, which he held until his death, and in which capacity he has formed many excellent pupils. For many years past also he held the post of principal viola at the concerts of the Cologne Society for chamber music. As a composer, the deceased made himself favourably known by a symphony and other orchestral works, which have been frequently performed on the Continent and in the United States. He has also written a quantity of chamber music, pianoforte pieces, and songs, while his pianoforte arrangements of many of the older classical masterpieces are much esteemed. The deceased was an artist of loftiest ideals, as modest as he was gifted, and his loss leaves a distinct void in the musical life of Cologne.

In the death, on November 18, at Vienna, of Dr. Albert von Hermann, at the early age of thirty-one, the career of a gifted musician and brilliant writer on musical subjects has been prematurely cut short. In his capacity of musical critic of the Vaterland and of collaborator with Professor Hanslick on the Neue Freie Presse, Dr. von Hermann's contributions were invariably characterised by great judgment combined with moderation, while a series of articles from his pen, published some time since in the last-named widely-read journal, on the subject of reform of the Viennese Conservatorium, attracted considerable attention. He was assistant-secretary in the Austrian Ministry of Education, and has proved himself an able composer in some choral pieces and songs.

Dr. Samuel Francis Smith, the author of "America," which with "The Star-Spangled Banner" takes rank as the National Hymn of the United States, died suddenly whilst travelling recently near Boston. He was born at Boston on October 21, 1808, and had, therefore, attained the mature age of eighty-seven. Only recently, at a public reception given him at his native town, his "America" was sung with enthusiasm by a thousand voices; the words having been written and adapted to the tune of "God save the Queen" in 1832, the author being at the time, curiously enough, quite ignorant of the origin and national significance of the melody. Dr. Smith was a graduate in Arts at the Harvard University, and in Theology at Andover. In 1832 he entered the Baptist ministry and became the editor of the Baptist Missionary Magazine. Ten years later he removed to Newton and became co-editor with Stow of the Baptist collection "The Psalmist." Among his better known hymns are "The solemn service now is done," "Down to the sacred wave," "Onward speed Thy conquering flight," and "Planted in Christ the living Vine."

The celebrated scene painter, Carlo Brioschi, died at Vienna on November 13, at the age of seventy. He was a native of Milan, and for many years past had been officially attached to the Viennese Imperial Opera, while his truly artistic productions were in great demand at the leading theatres in all parts of Europe. Some ten years ago he retired from his post at the Opera, and was succeeded by his son, Anton Brioschi, who inherits the father's talent. He was an "actual member" of the Viennese Academy of Fine Arts.

Francesco Magri, the whilom celebrated primo ballerino at the Theatre La Scala, died at Milan recently, aged seventy-eight. His fame as a ballet-dancer was of European extent, and after his retirement from the stage he devoted himself successfully to the invention of ballet pantomimes, the number of them being legion, including, amongst the most successful, "Odalisca" and "Preziosetta," with music by Dall Argine, and "Il Duca di Beaufort," the music by Usiglio.

The death is announced, on the 2nd ult., at Naples, of Giorgio Miceli, distinguished composer and excellent pianist. He was born on October 21, 1836, at Reggio Calabria, and was a pupil, at Naples, of Gullo and Giuseppe Lillo. When only sixteen years of age, Miceli made his début as a composer with an opera, "Zoé," which ran for forty nights. Other lyrical stage-works from his pen are "Gli Amanti Sessagenari," "Il Conte di Rossiglione," "L'Ombra Bianca," "Il Convito di Baldassare," and "La Figlia de Jefte." He was also the composer of a trio and a quartet for strings, which obtained first prizes at Naples and Florence competitions; of a Miserere for female voices, with orchestra; of a Hymn dedicated to the Italian Navy, and of numerous pianoforte pieces and songs.

Signor Jefte Sbolci, celebrated violoncellist and able conductor, died suddenly, at Florence, on the 7th ult. He was the founder of the Società Orchestrale, in Florence, and for the last thirty years held the principal professorship of his instrument at the Instituto Musicale in that town. He was a member of the famous Florentine String Trio, led by Buonamici, and also distinguished himself as the conductor of some important musical celebrations, notably the commemorative one in connection with the transference of the remains of Rossini to Italian soil. The deceased artist was born on September 5, 1833, at Florence.

Madame Ernesta Grisi, a relative of the two celebrated prime donne of that name, and sister of Carlotta Grisi, the famous ballet dancer, died at Paris last month. She was herself an operatic singer in her youth, having appeared, amongst other places, at the old Théâtre Italien, in Paris, but did not achieve any very great distinction. She was in her eighty-fourth year.

We regret to have to announce the death, on the 9th ult., at Jersey, of Mr. Frederick William Wainwright Bampfylde, a highly esteemed Professor of the Royal Academy of Music, at the early age of thirty-seven. He was the son of the late Major F. J. Bampfylde, of Bath, and from a child showed remarkable musical talent. For some years the deceased was organist at the church of the late Rev. E. H. (afterwards Dean) Plumptre, at Bickley, and afterwards at St. James's, Paddington, and for some years previous to his death conducted the Croydon Conservatoire, in conjunction with Mr. Howard B. Humphery. When a young man, he had the misfortune to meet with an accident while on horseback, causing an injury to the spine from the effects of which he never quite recovered. His loss will be deeply regretted by all who knew him.

We have also to record the following deaths:—

Recently, at Moscow, P. P. SOLOTARENKO, conductor of the Korsc Theatre, musical director of the ballet of the Imperial Opera, successful composer of ballets, aged sixty.

On November 24, at Hernals, near Vienna, JOSEPH SCHRAMMEL, director of the well known Schrammel Quartet, composer of popular songs, aged forty-three.

On November 24, at Ingolstadt, LOUIS ZINKER, for many years director of the Opera, aged sixty-seven.

On November 22, at Unkel-on-Rhine, FRAU AUGUSTE LOEWE, widow of Dr. Carl Loewe, the celebrated composer of balladen; as Fräulein Lange, a highly esteemed singer, aged ninety.

Recently, at Dresden, OSCAR DITTRICH, music director, esteemed vocal teacher, cantor and organist, aged fifty.

On the 4th ult., at Klagenfurt, JOSEF KALENSKY, pianoforte manufacturer and excellent musician, aged forty-four.

Recently, at Tangerhütte, HOFRATH ROBERT KLEINSCHMIDT, formerly one of the directors of the Euterpe Musical Society, highly esteemed in Leipzig musical circles.

On the 4th ult., at Hereford, Rev. Canon HENRY WRIGHT PHILLOTT, M.A., Chancellor of the choir, in his eightieth year.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOME MUSICAL EXPERIENCES IN ITALY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The writer who has lately given your readers the benefit of "Some Musical Experiences in Italy" would have made his contributions to your pages still more interesting if he had informed himself as to the significance of some of the religious ceremonies which he describes.

The "Blessing of the Palms" is a custom which is observed annually in Catholic churches throughout the world; and, like the procession which follows, it is full of symbolism.

The "long musical dialogue" which "C. F. A. W." heard while the doors of St. Mark's, Venice, were closed was doubtless the singing of the hymn "Gloria, laus, et honor tibi sit Rex Christe Redemptor," followed by a portion of Psalm xxiii.* beginning at the seventh verse with the words "Attollite portas, principes vestras, et elevamini, portæ æternales, et introibit Rex gloriæ."

The "long dialogue lasting a whole hour, in very florid plain-song," can only have been the singing of the Passion according to St. Matthew, which always occupies the place of the Gospel for the day on Palm Sunday. An excellent account of the manner in which this is done is given by the late Mr. Rockstro in his article on "Passion Music" in Sir George Grove's Dictionary. It will be sufficient here to say that the music usually sung on such occasions by the choir is that composed by Vittoria three centuries ago.

There can be little doubt that it was to this simple but deeply impressive Sacred Drama that Bach owed the idea which inspired his far more elaborate "St. Matthew" Passion.

In regard to the bell-ringing episode which disturbed "C. F. A. W.," let me explain that this also is an annual custom. On Maundy Thursday all the bells of the church are rung during the intonation by the Celebrant of the "Gloria in Excelsis," after which no sound of any bell is heard (not even at the "elevation") until the Mass on Holy Saturday.

It should be added that all the ceremonies here referred to may be witnessed without travelling to Italy; and if your contributor happens to be in London during next Holy Week he may easily discover several Catholic churches in which the same ritual is carefully and accurately performed.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

F. E. GLADSTONE.

* This is the numbering of the Latin Vulgate. In the Protestant version the same Psalm is No. xxiv.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—"C. F. A. W.," in his most interesting diary, speaks of two services which he does not altogether understand—one was that at Venice, on Palm Sunday. The dialogue at the West door of the church and during the procession would consist of Antiphons, Responses, and Versicles, the words of which are mostly taken from Scripture, and have for their subject the triumphant procession of Christ into Jerusalem, which the Church observes on the Sunday before Good Friday, or, as it is called, Dominica in Palmis. If "C. F. A. W." would care to know the words, he would find them—or, if not the exact words, those like them—in the translation of the "Sarum Missal." It would be in the course of this procession that the "Gloria, laus, et honor" would be sung.

The "long dialogue lasting an hour" would doubtless be the singing of the Passion according to St. Matthew. It is sometimes intoned by three clergy: one takes the words of Christ, another those of the Jews and disciples, and the third the words of the Evangelist or the narrative. The intonation, or, I should say perhaps, the cadences, vary. I heard the Passion intoned at Milan at the Cathedral by one priest, in the North pulpit, and very finely and reverently done. I have a copy of the Passion set to music for four voices by Ludovicus Daser, in the large square notation, without bars, printed in 1578. I do not think this work has been printed for present Church use in modern notation and with bars. There are few who could sing such elaborate music in these days from the old printing.

Then the service at which all the bells in the church were rung during Mass was very probably the Mass on Easter Eve, or it might have been on Maundy Thursday. The bells are rung at the singing of the "Gloria in Excelsis" and not again till the "Gloria" is sung on Easter Eve.

The writer speaks of the falsi bordoni of Zacharias, but I do not understand whether he speaks of Motets by Zacharias in that style. I have a fine folio of Zacharias, or, as he is termed in the preface to the book (the title of which is missing), Cæsar de Zachariis Cremonensis. My copy was printed in 1594, and contains the tones and hymns. The tones in falsi bordoni occupy eighty-two folios, the hymns also f. b. 138 folios. The initial letters are of good impression; there are five lines in the stave, and the music is written for four voices. It has been a choir book, and the square notes are very large. There is an "Instructio brevis tonorum authoris ad benevolum cantorem," in verse. Would that we could hear such music in England!

H. A. W.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—On reading the interesting article "Musical Experiences in Italy" in your December number, it occurred to me to make one or two suggestions to the writer in the event of his going to Italy again.

1. The best organ-playing in Italy is to be heard at Verona. It is even better than at Sta. Maria del' Anima in Rome.

2. It is well worth while to stay a day or two at Monte Cassino, try the large organ there, and talk to the monks about music.

3. If possible, a visit to St. John Lateran should be arranged when some of Casciolini's beautiful Mass-music is to be heard. This composer's works are too little known in England, and (excepting at St. Benedict's, Manchester) seldom appear in English Church Service lists. At St. John Lateran they are sung to perfection.—Yours truly,

L. J. T. DARWALL.

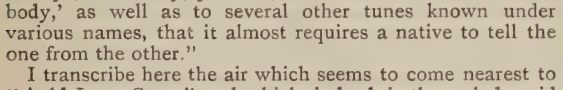
"AUld LANG SYNE."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In the report of Mr. W. H. Cummings's Lecture on "National Song," at the Royal Academy of Music, which appears in The Musical Times for November, I read, somewhat to my surprise, the following:—"The words of 'Auld Lang Syne' were certainly not written by Burns, as some had maintained." Unless Mr. Cummings is inadequately reported he is, I beg to say, not altogether correct, the fact being that of the five verses of the song, three only are old and two are by Burns. This is according to the statement of the poet himself, in a letter to Johnson of the "Museum," who had supposed the whole to be old.

As to the music of the song, I have referred to Shield's "Rosina," in the Overture to which Mr. Cummings says the original is to be found, but cannot find anything in the Overture bearing the faintest resemblance to the melody. It is possible that in my copy of the opera, which I have examined, the Overture is not given in full.

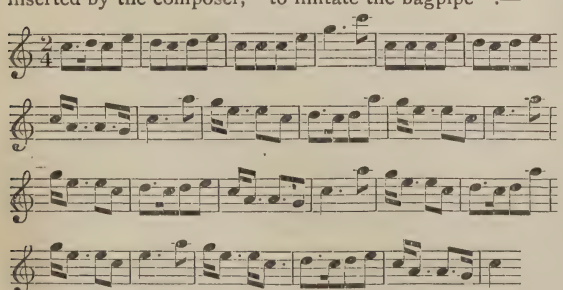


The edition is one of four English Ballad Operas arranged by J. L. Hatton, and published by Boosey and Co. a few years ago. If the Overture has been there cut down the air may be found in what remains. I note that there are 117 bars in the Overture in that series.

But apart from all this, as respects the music, I think the Germans have the truth of the matter in regard to National Song, in their saying, quoted by Mr. Cummings: "National songs compose themselves." And as to the air of "Auld Lang Syne," I incline to the opinion of Mr. G. F. Graham in his authoritative "Songs of Scotland Collection," where he writes as follows regarding this tune: "The air bears so strong a resemblance to 'Comin' thro' the rye,' 'Oh, hey, Johnnie, lad,' 'For the sake o' somebody,' as well as to several other tunes known under various names, that it almost requires a native to tell the one from the other."

I transcribe here the air which seems to come nearest to "Auld Lang Syne," and which, indeed, is the melody said to be in Shield's "Rosina" Overture, where, however, I fail to recognise it in my copy of the opera.

"I FEE'D A LAD AT MICHAELMAS."



(In Johnson's "Museum.")

I am, Sir, yours truly,

William Hume.

[I quoted three letters written by Burns on the origin of the words of "Auld Lang Syne," and added that the first, fourth, and fifth verses were old, whilst the second and third were by Burns himself. My edition of Shield's "Rosina" is an oblong folio, published in 1783; the tune I take to be the original of "Auld Lang Syne" is given to the oboe, the bassoons playing a pedal bass with the words, inserted by the composer, "to imitate the bagpipe":—

Mr. Hume is doubtless aware that "Auld Lang Syne" was published with two airs, one in 1740 the other in 1793, and that it was not till twelve years after the production of Shield's "Rosina" that it appeared with the tune now always associated with the words, the earlier tunes having been abandoned.—W. H. Cummings.]

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Abergavenny.—The Choral Society, conducted by Mr. W. R. Carr, gave its second Concert this season on the 9th ult., when Dr. Gaul's cantata "Joan of Arc" was interpreted by an orchestra and chorus of about 120 performers, with Miss M. Purvis and Mr. W. Thomas as solo vocalists. Mr. A. Angle was principal violinist, Mr. F. Bumford presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. B. Restall at the harmonium. In a miscellaneous second part a violoncello solo was contributed by Mr. Percy Angle.

Bradfield.—A successful Concert was given on the 11th ult., under the direction of Mr. R. H. Bellairs, organist and choirmaster of the College. The most important feature of the programme consisted of selections from J. More Smieton's dramatic cantata "King Arthur," in which the parts of Arthur and Merlin were taken by Messrs. Ingram and Piggott. Mr. Bellairs contributed some pianoforte solos by D'Albert and Chopin, and Mr. Abdy Williams two movements of Rode's Seventh Violin Concerto. Songs by Bizet and Sterndale Bennett were sung by Messrs. E. Mackenzie and A. J. F. Hood, and the College string orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Hayes, of Oxford, besides accompanying "King Arthur" and the Concerto, played the "Athalie" war march and Resch's Gavotte "Heimliche Liebe," the latter being encored.

Chertsey.—An Organ Recital was given in St. Peter's Church, on the 11th ult., by Mr. Mark Andrews, organist of Farningham Parish Church. The programme included the Toccata and Fugue in D minor by Bach, the Fantasia in E minor by Lemmens, and Gounod's "Nazareth," the last-named being sung by the Rev. E. Colchester.

Chichester.—Dr. Hubert Parry's "Job" was sung, on November 25, by Miss M. Harris, Mr. E. Branscombe, Mr. B. Pierpoint, Mr. E. Davies, and a chorus of 120 voices, under the conductorship of Mr. F. J. Read. Mr. A. Burnett was the principal violin of an excellent orchestra, and the performance reflected much credit on the musical society by whom it was given. The programme also included the "Song of Hannah," by the esteemed conductor, and Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture.

Eastbourne.—Two excellent Lectures on the study of the pianoforte were given in the Town Hall, on November 16 and 30 respectively, by Mr. George Langley, who explained in a most instructive and lucid manner some of the difficulties and requirements of the pianist.

Gravesend.—An excellent performance of Handel's oratorio "Judas Maccabæus" was given in the New Public Hall, by the members of the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association, on the 11th ult. The solo vocalists were Miss Kate Cove, Miss Lillian Corner, Mr. Roland Essenleigh, and Mr. Douglas Powell, who all acquitted themselves admirably of their respective duties. Mr. Essenleigh, a member of the Association, who sang at short notice in place of Mr. W. Green, deserves special notice for his effective and finished renderings of the tenor solos. The orchestra, composed chiefly of members of the Royal Engineers Band, Chatham, and local amateurs, led by Mr. E. B. Norman, with Mr. H. Moss at the harmonium, played well, and Mr. Charles R. Green ably conducted. The usual public rehearsal was given the night before, when Miss Bertha Acworth, Mr. R. Essenleigh, Mr. Fred. Noakes (all members of the Association), and Miss Lillian Corner sang the solo music, the orchestra being the same.

Guildford.—The Choral Society gave an effective performance of "Elijah," on November 28, in the County and Borough Hall, under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Wilkes. The principal soloists were Miss Jessie Scott, Mrs. Kate Lee, Mr. F. Pearce, and Mr. A. Walenn; and the instrumental portion of the work was well rendered by a professional orchestra.

Handsworth.—The first Concert of the second series of the St. James's Choral Society took place in the Public Hall, Soho Road, on the 10th ult. The programme consisted of Sullivan's cantata "On Shore and Sea," Horsley's waltz-chorus from "Euterpe," the part-songs "Sweet and low" (Barnby) and "O lovely May" (German), and soprano and tenor solos, sung by Miss Amy Kendal and Mr. Swingler. Miss Cleobury ably officiated as accompanist, and Mr. Richard Richards conducted.

Kingston-on-Thames.—Schumann's "Advent Hymn" and Bridge's "Cradle of Christ" were excellently rendered in the Parish Church, by the Kingston Choral Society, on the 18th ult. The soloists were Miss Marion V. E. Perrott and Mr. Sidney Beckley. Mr. Edwin Stephenson presided at the organ, and Mr. A. P. Alderton, organist of the church, conducted.

Llanelly.—Mr. Arthur W. Swindell's pupils' twelfth annual Concert was held at the Parish Hall on November 26, before a crowded and appreciative audience.

Loughton.—The Choral Society gave Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and Bennett's "May Queen" in the Public Hall, on the 9th ult., with great success. The programme also included some chamber music, which was played by Mr. W. B. Carter, Dr. Adams, Mr. Hill, and the conductor of the Society, Mr. Henry Riding.

Maidstone.—Dr. H. F. Henniker's new one-act opera, "Cavaliers and Roundheads," a title admirably indicative of the story of the libretto, was successfully produced on November 29 at the Corn Exchange. The principal characters were effectively embodied by Miss R. Pine, Madame M. Jones, and Messrs. J. Willey, W. Day, D. Hay, H. Pope, W. F. Bevis, and A. Blake. The choruses were brightly sung, and an orchestra of about sixty executants did justice to the instrumental portions of the work, which was enthusiastically received.

Mansfield.—The Harmonic Society performed Cowen's "Rose Maiden" in the Town Hall on the 6th ult. The soloists were Miss Marjorie Eaton, Miss Bladon, Mr. Kemp, and Mr. Birch.

Newport (Mon.).—The Post Office Band gave its annual Concert, on November 26, to a crowded audience, in the new Tredegar Hall. The vocalists engaged were Miss Marjorie Eaton, Miss Foxcroft, Mr. Clavering Archer, and Mr. W. H. Cradock. Miss Eaton was particularly successful in Macfarren's "Pack clouds away," with clarinet obbligato by Mr. G. Cain, and in Mackenzie's Cradle Songs. Miss Driscoll accompanied.

Oswestry.—The Choral Society gave the first Concert of the season in the Victoria Rooms on the 6th ult., when an excellent performance of Gounod's "Redemption" was secured. The band and chorus numbered one hundred, and the principal artists were Miss E. Davies, Miss E. Rasey, Mr. Page, and Mr. Burgon. Dr. C. T. Reynolds conducted with his usual ability.

Perth.—Miss Steele's Choir made its first appearance this season in the City Hall, on November 28. The well arranged programme was received with great favour by a large audience. The choral numbers included Lassus' madrigal "Matona, Lovely Maiden" and part-songs by Mendelssohn ("On the sea"), Macfarren, Gounod, MacCunn, Charles Wood ("Full Fathom Five"), and others. The vocalist was Mr. Andrew Black, who contributed Henschel's "Young Dietrich," Sullivan's "Thou'rt passing hence," and the "Toreador" song from "Carmen." Mr. Maurice Sons played a Spohr Adagio and "Légende" by Wieniawski, and took part in string quartets by Haydn and Beethoven. Mr. Bayrhoffer's solo was the Andante from one of Romberg's Violoncello Concertos.

Ripley.—Dr. Gaul's cantata "Joan of Arc" was performed, on the 11th ult., in the Public Hall, by the Choral Society, consisting of a chorus and orchestra of 120 executants, under the direction of Mr. W. G. Taylor. The soloists were Miss Marjorie Eaton, Mr. H. Stansfield, and Mr. J. Sharp. Mr. J. Soar was principal violinist, and efficient assistance was rendered at the pianoforte and organ respectively by Miss Little and Mr. J. Caulton.

Ruthin.—A successful Concert was given by the United Choral Society, under the able conductorship of Mr. R. Harris Jones, on the 13th ult., in the Town Hall. The first part of the programme consisted of Dr. A. R. Gaul's popular cantata "The Holy City," the second part being of a miscellaneous character. The principal vocalists were Miss J. Roberts, Miss A. Jones, Mr. A. F. Thornborough, and Mr. H. Vaughan Davies. The chorus was decidedly good, and a very efficient orchestra was led by Mr. H. Haselden.

St. Alban's, Herts.—The Oratorio Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Speer, gave an effective performance of Spohr's "Last Judgment," on the 5th ult., in the Town Hall. The soloists were Miss B. Powell, Miss Bush, Mr. O. Dene, and Mr. H. W. Bull. Miss Powell also sang the solo part in Mendelssohn's Motet "Hear my Prayer," which concluded the Concert. Mr. Stanley Blagrove was principal violinist. On the 13th ult. Mr. W. H. Speer, ably assisted by Miss Longford, some members of the Oratorio Society, and St. Peter's Church Choir, gave an attractive Organ Recital in St. Peter's Church.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The bi-centenary of the death of Henry Purcell was celebrated by an admirable Organ Recital given on November 24, by Mr. Felix Cruse, in St. Peter's Church. The well-selected programme included Purcell's fine anthems "I will sing unto the Lord," "O God, Thou art my God," and "Rejoice in the Lord alway."

Stourport.—A successful Concert was given at the Town Hall on November 28, by Miss Edith Kingman (pianist) and Miss Edith Knott (vocalist), who were assisted by Miss Ella Hughes, Mr. Hamlyn Crimp, Mr. W. H. Henley (violinist), and Mr. J. L. Wedley (accompanist).

The soloists taking part in the work were Madame Medora Henson, Mr. Otto Dene, and Mr. David Bispham, who also sang in a miscellaneous second part, which included orchestral performances of Rossini's Overture to "Semiramide," Edward German's characteristic Dances from the incidental music to "Henry VIII.," and the beautiful evening hymn from Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Golden Legend." Mr. E. G. Woodward was principal violin, Mr. D. T. Williams presided at the organ, and Mr. W. F. Hulley conducted.

Sydney, Australia.—The annual Festival Services at All Saints' Church, Petersham, were celebrated on November 1, under the conductorship of Mr. W. T. Wood, with Mr. W. Angus presiding at the organ. The music included Tours's setting in D of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, and the following anthems: "Praise the Lord" (Elvey), "I will lay me down in peace" (A. H. Maine), and "They shall mount up on wings" (Caleb Simper).

Tonbridge.—An excellent Concert, under the direction of Mr. Herbert Brewer, was given on the 11th ult., at the Tonbridge School, the programme including Dr. C. H. Lloyd's dramatic cantata "Hero and Leander," which was conducted by the composer. The soloists were Miss B. Gough and Mr. W. Dodds.

THE SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.

GRADUATED EXERCISES FOR ELEMENTARY CLASSES IN BOTH NOTATIONS.

In the October issue of THE SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW a series of graduated exercises in both notations was commenced. These exercises will be adapted for use in school and other classes beginning an Autumn course. They will provide not only easy sight singing studies to be done in the class room, but exercises suitable for home study. With blackboard work and an educational method of teaching songs, they will probably suffice for the needs of many school classes, or they will usefully supplement a regular class book.

School songs in both notations, and studies and tests of a more advanced character, will also be given as heretofore in the music section.

LESSONS ON INTERVALS AND THEIR NOMENCLATURE.

The identification and nomenclature of intervals is one of the difficulties of elementary musical theory.

With a view to assist Teachers and Students, a set of plain lessons upon this topic was commenced in the October issue of THE SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.

The system of naming recommended by the Education Department, the Royal Academy of Music, Trinity College, &c., will be used.

Copies of the October and November numbers may be obtained of the Publishers.

THE SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW,

Published on the First of every Month,

Price (Letterpress and Music), 1½d.; Annual Subscription (including Postage), 2s.

Teachers and others who wish to secure a regular supply of the letterpress section are recommended to order THE SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW in advance. Only the music is reprinted according to demand.

*JOAN OF ARC

Staff Edition. Sixteenth to Twentieth Thousand.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

FIFTH AND SIXTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

†ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

The above Cantatas have been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral.

J. STAINER.

This Work is an attempt to supply the want long felt of an easy and short form of Passion Music suitable for use in ordinary Parish Churches. It is composed for two solo voices, a Tenor and a Bass, and for the church choir. At intervals hymns occur, in which the whole congregation can join. The performance will probably not extend over forty minutes in duration, thus giving an opportunity for a suitable "address" if thought advisable. No orchestra is required, the accompaniments being specially adapted for the organ only; much of the expense usually attending Passion Services will therefore be avoided. The book of the words, for distribution among the congregation, contains the music of the Hymns; by this means it is hoped that the congregation will be induced to take part heartily in the service.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

Thirty-three years have elapsed since the publication of the first English edition, and faithful to its original as that edition may have been in the main, it has been felt that closer adherence to the accepted standard text is attainable, and, as far as is at all practicable, should be attained. With this view the present edition is issued. The chorales, choruses, and solos have been newly and independently translated from the original German words, and the adaptation of the narrative of the Evangelist, a task rendered perhaps somewhat less difficult and hazardous by the aid of the Revised Version of the New Testament, has been carefully reconsidered and re-arranged so as to preserve unaltered, as far as may be, the musical text of the original.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S

PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF
LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed, the work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul have to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively—'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' The style of the composition resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City,' and other of the composer's works. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for the author's lyrics; the tunes selected are from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will, undoubtedly, greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

NOTE.—The custom which prevails in schools of allowing pupils to play in unison, to the practical exclusion of part-playing, has suggested the need of such pieces as are contained in these volumes; and it is hoped that, besides providing for the want that is felt, they will also tend to modify the custom.—GEORGE CALKIN.

Sr.

A due attention to your Commission having gone hand in hand with what fancy & judgment I may be thought to posses in my profession, I thought it necessary to lay before you a true state of the merits and demerits of the Musical Performance, you are about to exhibit in King Arthur.

—To attain a certain rectitude, in judging of this matter, I have not only, with the utmost care and candor, inspected the Score of Purcell's Composition; but, attended two rehearsals of it; the result of which, is, as follows ——

—The long Scene of the Sacrifice, in the 1st. Act, necessary to be deliver'd in, as being written for Music, may have a solemn and noble effect provided, that the last Air & Chorus — "I call you all to Woden-hall" be perform'd, as I have now compos'd it; the introductory Air to be sung by Chambers, which, being highly spirited, will carry off, with an eclat, an (otherwise) dull, tedious, antiquated suite of Chorus: Besides — which, that long, as set by Purcell, is intirely out of Mr. Baddeby's compass, very indifferent, and no way proper for a Woman, where a troop of Warriors are assembled, to bribe their Idols, for Success in battle.

The following Song & Chorus — "Come, if you dare, our Trumpets Sound" is, in Purcell, tolerable; but so very short of that Intrepity and Spirited defiance, pointed at by Dryden's words and sentiments, that, I think, you have only to hear what I have compos'd, on the occasion, to make you immediately reject the other.

The Air — "Let not a Moon-born Elf mislead you" is, after the two first bars of Purcell, very bad, and out of M^r. Champnes' compass of Voice — Hear mine.

All the other Solo Songs of Purcell are infamously bad — so very bad, that they are privately the objects of sneer and ridicule to the Musicians. but I have not meddled with any, that are not to come from the mouths of your principal Performers.

— I wish you wou'd only give me leave to — Doctor this Performance — I would certainly make it pleasing to the Public, which, otherwise, may prove an obstruction to the success of the Revival.

— It is not now my intention to new set many things, mention'd in our original plan; but to put it in the power of your principal performers to make a proper figure, by opening and adorning the most entertaining point of view, wherein they are to appear; consequently, the expence will be much short of the Sume propos'd; all self = = interest subsiding to the earnest desire I shall ever entertain of proving my sincerity, — when I stile my self —— Sr.

Your devoted humble Serv!

MR. SADLEUR BROWN

(TENOR).

For Oratorios, Concerts, Operatic Recitals, Banquets, At Homes, &c.

"Mr. Sadleur Brown sang 'If with all your hearts' (Mendelssohn) and 'In native worth' (Haydn) in charming style, his rich tenor voice being heard to great advantage. The rendering of 'If with all your hearts' was an exceedingly fine performance, the vocalist throwing an intensity of pathos and expression into the interpretation of the air which demonstrated that he is a singer of great taste and finish."—Surrey Advertiser, Guildford.

"This part was greatly enjoyed by the audience, and very much appreciated, if applause is any criterion. This good humour was, no doubt, induced by the opening song, 'Mary,' which has become a great favourite in Lowestoft lately. This was faultlessly sung by Mr. Sadleur Brown, who has a pure flute-like tenor voice, of exceptional quality and range, which he used with telling effect, especially in the pianissimo passages that are the charm of Richardson's song. As a result, the expressions of pleasure were loud and sustained when the last sweet note died away. Acceding to the call for more, Mr. Brown gave Blumenthal's 'Evening Song.' His other contributions added to his reputation."—Lowestoft.

MR. C. W. FREDERICKS

(Of the Trocadero, Paris; Crystal Palace and St. James's Hall, London; and Hereford Musical Festivals).

"Mr. Charles Fredericks has sung at my house. I find he possesses a charming tenor voice of good compass and pure quality, which he uses to great advantage, particularly in oratorio music.

"Charles Gounod."

"Crystal Palace Company, London, S.E.

"I was so favourably impressed by your highly artistic rendering of the pieces which you sang at the Concert here recently, that I have placed you on the list of those tenor vocalists whom I consider worthy of an occasional engagement at our very best class of concerts, and I hope that I may soon have a chance to hear you here again.

"August Manns."

"Messiah" (Southport Philharmonic Society).—"Mr. C. W. Fredericks came amongst us for the second time last night, and certainly made friends with his audience in a very short time, his opening recitative, 'Comfort ye,' and the accompanying air, 'Every valley,' being splendidly rendered. Again was he successful in the second part, 'All they that see him,' 'Thy rebuke,' and 'Behold and see,' the latter especially being delivered with fine pathos, and well deserved the loud applause which followed."—Southport Standard, December 21, 1895.

"St. Paul" (Warwick Musical Society).—"The tenor soloist was Mr. C. W. Fredericks. He sings with taste and power, and has excellent method; and his credentials were such as made a capable acquittal on his part an absolute certainty. . . . In the address of Stephen, 'Men, brethren, and fathers,' he was heard to great advantage, the recitation being given with dramatic force. Equally meritorious was he in the record of the martyr's death, 'And they stoned him,' which he rendered with great pathos. But it was in the beautiful cavatina, 'Be thou faithful unto death,' that Mr. Fredericks gave the audience a full taste of his artistic capabilities. It seemed as though he had been holding himself in reserve for this number; certainly he excelled himself by the powers and feeling which he displayed in interpreting the composer's intentions with regard to one of the gems of the oratorio."—Warwick Advertiser, December 7, 1895.

"The first taste of the quality of Mr. Fredericks' voice was experienced when he took up the recitative, 'Men, brethren, and fathers,' and the expectation of the audience in regard to this talented vocalist were fully realised. Mr. Fredericks has a powerful voice, but capable of great modulation; he gave his recitatives with great feeling, and was listened to with deep pleasure. . . . After a brief interval the second part was commenced, and the solos of the Hon. Mrs. Lyttelton and Mr. Fredericks were rendered with the utmost taste and skill, the latter being particularly good in 'Be thou faithful unto death.'"—Leamington Spa Courier, December 7, 1895.

"From the layman's point of view, the great, the supreme merit of Mr. Smith's system consists in the fact that it involves the total abolition and disestablishment of all that terrible scale practising and five-finger exercising from which the much-enduring next-door neighbour has suffered so grievously and so long."—Westminster Gazette, November 20, 1895.

"Has attracted so much attention of late in the musical world."—Musical Times.

"We make no comparisons, but say simply, from personal experience, that Mr. Smith's system of training does all that he claims for it. . . . SIR JOSEPH BARNBY

BORN AUGUST 12, 1838; DIED JANUARY 28, 1896.

CLOSE upon each other's steps, during what has passed of this ominous year, death and disaster have followed, and now it is our melancholy duty to record the passing away of Sir Joseph Barnby. Mournful under any circumstances, there are some conditions amid which the dissolution of the body loses much of its terror. When a man has finished his life's work, and the enfeebled frame stoops under a weight of years, we can calmly think, with Lord Bacon, that "it is as natural to die as to be born." But the case is wholly different when, in the full vigour of maturity and in the midst of work, one is suddenly struck down, as by a bolt from the blue. Thus did Joseph Barnby die. As far as our knowledge goes, his health had lately given no cause for uneasiness. He went about his daily task as of old, and, only a few hours before the stroke fell, was presiding at a rehearsal of "Judas Maccabæus" by the Royal Choral Society. At ten o'clock the next morning the imperative summons came. It is more especially when Death appears in such a shape that the awful presence gives us pause, as being that which is scarcely natural, that which violates the regular and beneficent order of Providence, and fills us not only with grief, but infinite pity. Of the bereaved widow and orphans in the present sad example of untimely mortality, a humane mind scarcely dares to think. We can only trust that the few sources of comfort equal to their requirements may be abundantly open.

In these necessarily hurried lines it is not possible to give an adequate biographical sketch of the deceased musician, and we must be satisfied to mention the salient features of a very successful life. Sir Joseph Barnby, born at York on the date given above, became a chorister in the Minster of his native city, and spent his boyish years amid surroundings and influences which, no doubt, had a large share in determining his career, as, before everything else, a Church musician. He could have had no better school than that which has given so much distinction to English art, while that he made good use of opportunity then, and, later, at the Royal Academy of Music, was proved in various ways, notably by his honourable position in a hard struggle for the Mendelssohn Scholarship, which, perhaps, only Arthur Sullivan could have carried off against him. His education completed, as far as professors were concerned, Joseph Barnby naturally took service under the banner of the Church which had nurtured him. Acting as organist and choirmaster first at St. James the Less, Westminster, he removed, in 1863, to a similar, but more important, post at St. Andrew's, Wells Street, where he remained till 1871. During that time the music at St. Andrew's became more than metropolitan in repute. It was not only performed with uncommon excellence, but distinguished by considerable enterprise. Always an admirer of Gounod, Mr. Barnby made the sacred works of that master familiar to frequenters of the church, doing the same good turn for others, whose claims he recognised regardless of nationality. In 1871 the increasingly active musician transferred his services to St. Anne's, Soho, and made that church famous in turn, especially in connection with Lenten music; attracting crowds by his renderings of Bach's "Passion" according both to St. Matthew and St. John. So much activity and success prepared the way for still higher things, and, in 1875, Mr. Barnby was appointed Precentor and Director of Musical Instruction at Eton College. That important position he retained till shortly before election to a still more onerous and responsible post as Principal of the Guildhall School of Music. With resignation from Eton, his direct, personal service to the Church ceased. But he worked for the music of worship in more than one way, being as active with his pen as at the organ or in choir practice. He leaves behind him a long list of Services, Anthems, hymn-tunes, and Chants, many of which have come into general use, are highly prized, and will perpetuate his name. In this connection may also be mentioned the sacred idyll "Rebekah," and a setting of the Psalm "The Lord is King," written for the Leeds Festival of 1883.

It is now time to glance at Sir Joseph Barnby's career outside his work for the Church. Here we meet with evidence of constant activity and progress, beginning with the establishment, in 1867, of Barnby's Choir, for the performance of madrigals and other distinctively choral music. Two years later came the foundation of Novello's Oratorio Concerts, under his musical directorship; and subsequently, following M. Gounod's resignation as conductor of the Albert Hall Choral Society, his appointment to the vacant post, in the discharge of the duties of which Death may almost be said to have found him. It was, no doubt, with special reference to successful work at the Albert Hall that Mr. Barnby received the honour of knighthood in 1892. No reward of the kind was ever more fairly earned by devotion to duty.

The sudden removal of so active and comprehensive a labourer in the field of music leaves, like that of Sir Charles Hallé not long since, a great gap to be filled up. A successor must be found at the Guildhall School, at the Royal Albert Hall, in the conductor's seat of the Cardiff Triennial Festival, and for the South Wales Festival which has yet to hold its first meeting. We can only hope that with the new men will also be obtained the qualities which made Sir Joseph Barnby a successful organiser, a choir trainer without peer, and a toiler who, once having put his hand to the plough, never thought of looking back.

It will not be inappropriate to mention here the close relations which have existed between the proprietors of THE MUSICAL TIMES and the eminent man whom now we mourn. As for a long time musical adviser to Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., and as conductor of concerts given by the firm, the connection was necessarily intimate, and now adds a sense of personal loss to that in which the whole musical world shares. There remains for all who, in any sense, are conscious of such loss to bear it resignedly, and to comfort themselves and one another with the thought that—

> Beyond the flight of time,
> Beyond this vale of death,
> There surely is some blessèd clime
> Where life is not a breath,
> Nor life's affections transient fire,
> Whose sparks fly upward and expire.

With this Number are presented gratis Extra Supplements, consisting of a new Anthem for Easter, by J. Varley Roberts, entitled, "Christ is risen from the dead," and the fac-simile of a letter written by Madame Grisi.

HENRY PURCELL'S HANDWRITING.

Visitors to the Purcell Exhibition, which was held at the British Museum in connection with the Purcell Festival of which we have all heard so much during the past few months, will have been struck by the difference, as there shown, in the composer's handwriting, not only at different periods, but at the same period of his life. Something can of course be said in favour of the theory that a man's hand varies in the course of years; but when we remember that Purcell died at the age of thirty-six, we cannot expect to see any great variations. Perhaps our best plan in dealing with the subject will be to take the different autographs, or reputed autographs, as far as possible in chronological order, briefly noting any peculiarities in the notation and the watermarks. First, however, we must dismiss in a few words those MSS. which, though hitherto considered autographs, have been proved otherwise by recent research.

1. Additl. MS. 33240, ff. 1-5, containing the organ part of the Ode for "St. Cecilia's Day," 1683—recently performed at the Philharmonic Concert in connection with the Purcell Festival—is in the hand of Daniel Henstridge (c. 1670-1730), organist of Canterbury Cathedral (compare the writing of Additl. 30932, ff. 48,155 b, &c.).

2. The volume of anthems belonging to the Royal College of Music, recently exhibited at the British Museum, was long considered autograph, on the authority of Richard Clark (1780-1856), lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey, &c., an enthusiastic musical antiquarian, who sometimes, however, allowed his zeal to get the better of his discretion. Neither the writing of the text nor the peculiar G clef used—nor the ornamental ending to each anthem—

nor the watermarks, correspond with those in any of Purcell's authenticated autographs. The British Museum possesses a large volume [Additl. 33287] of contemporary anthems, welcome-songs, &c., in the same hand and on similar paper.

3. The volume of anthems (three by Gibbons, five by Purcell, and seven by Blow) in the possession of Mr. W. H. Cummings is, with the exception of the last anthem, in the same hand as some portions of the Buckingham Palace MS. (here described as No. 7), dated 1685 and 1690. But as this latter hand is quite different from the principal hand—which is undoubtedly Purcell's—and changes from the latter abruptly more than once in the middle of a composition—it cannot very well be the composer's writing, but is rather that of an amanuensis. Here, again, a peculiar G clef is used—quite unlike that usually employed by Purcell; the C clef form is the heads of the notes are put on straight, like pins' heads, and each of the pieces in this new hand is signed (in the Queen's MS.) Mr. Henry Pursell, whereas the composer spelt his name with a c.

4. Additl. MS. 5333 contains imperfect scores of "King Arthur," "The Libertine," and the "Yorkshire Feast Song." Besides a modern-looking G clef and a commonplace C clef in Acts I. and IV. of "King Arthur" and in the "Libertine" music, the forms appear in the greater part of the volume. At the end is written—in three lines—"Finis, Mr.

A comparison of these MSS. with several of Croft's autograph compositions in Additl. 17847, and elsewhere, will leave very little doubt as to who is the transcriber of the present MS.

Of the possible, not to say probable, autographs, a fairly representative list follows:—

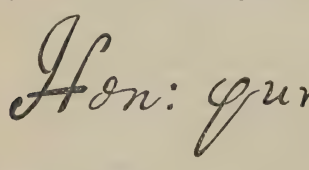
5. Additl. 17784 is a volume containing the bass part of a collection of anthems and services having at the beginning the portrait of King Charles II., and therefore probably for the use of his chapel. From internal evidence the MS. appears to have been transcribed in 1676, the year in which Henry Purcell was appointed music-copyist to Westminster Abbey; so, if he combined this post with that of copyist to the Chapel Royal, as his immediate successor William Tucker appears to have done, the volume may very well be in Purcell's hand. However, as the text and musical notes are copied in a conventional hand—a quasi-imitation of printing—the MS. is of no use for comparison with the other autographs.

6. Additl. 30930 is a folio volume having seventy-two leaves written on, besides many blank ones, and is entirely composed of works by Henry Purcell—namely, the Fantazias of three to eight parts, the posthumous Sonatas, Latin hymns, and English hymns or metrical anthems. The dates given are 1680-1683. The forms assumed by the G, C, and F clefs in this volume are, with slight variations,

The hand in which the text is written is quite formed. The general direction of the letters is perpendicular. The modern form of the letter e is used; the watermarks are—(1) a large I. H. S., the middle letter surmounted by a plain cross, with E. T. below, and (2) a large fleur-de-lys.

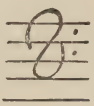
7. A thick volume written on similar paper (as to size and watermarks) to the foregoing, containing at one end nineteen anthems, many of them with instrumental accompaniments, by Henry Purcell, and one by Dr. Blow; none of these are dated, but several are known to have been composed in 1685. At the other end are thirty-nine Welcome-songs, Odes, duets, &c., many of them bearing dates from 1681 to 1690. By far the greater number of these, including Dr. Blow's anthem, are in the same hand as No. 6; once—at the end of a Welcome-song dated 1681—the composer's signature is given in full as follows:

Several other pieces are initialled in the same hand. The second hand, which apparently only comes in after 1685, has been sufficiently described under No. 3; it will not be necessary to say anything about a third hand which occasionally appears, as it bears no resemblance to any of the reputed autographs. This splendid volume of Her Majesty's belonged at one time to Henry Purcell's only surviving son, Edward, and after him to the latter's son, Edward Henry, both of whom have inscribed notes to that effect in the volume. There can hardly be any reasonable doubt as to the greater part of this volume—and therefore also No. 6—being in Purcell's autograph.



8a. Two songs with a bass, "She who my poor heart possesses" and "How happy are they," belonging to Mr. Julian Marshall. The G clef used in this MS. is very like that which appears in most of Purcell's autographs; the F clef has nothing remarkable about it. The watermark is a heart with what looks like an inverted pair of pince-nez under it. The old form of the letter e appears throughout, and at the end are the initials

8b. "Cease, anxious world," song with bass, also belonging to Mr. Julian Marshall. A reproduction of the G clef and of the rather peculiar flats used in this MS. follows:



the watermark is P. B.—the same as in Additl. 30932, ff. 94-98. At the end is the signature

9. Fitzwilliam MS. 23H. 13. A large volume of anthems by Purcell and others. The date given in the index at the beginning is very indistinctly written, and may be 1681 or 1687. It certainly cannot be 1673, for which it has generally been taken, as in the same hand Blow is styled Dr. Blow, whereas he was not made a Doctor of Music till 1677 or 1678. The first forty-two pages of the MS. are in a rather later hand than the main body, which is evidently in the same hand as No. 6, &c. Both forms of the e are used at the beginning of the volume.

10a. Additl. 30932, ff. 52, 87, 94. Three anthems composed before 1683; for they seem to be all about the same date, and two of them appear in Fitzwilliam MS. 30G 10, which is supposed to be written in that year. For the G and C clefs see fac-simile under No. 6. The F clef here assumes the unusual form of rather like that employed by Pelham Humfrey. The handwriting is rather unformed and irregular; the older form of the e is used. From the corrections and alterations they are evidently original MSS. The watermarks are (1) a Fool's head with cap and bells and collar with long points, and underneath (on a larger scale)— and (2) none for the first two anthems, and P. B. or P. T. for the last.

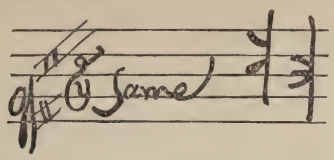
10b. Additl. 30932, f. 121. An anthem ("Behold now, praise the Lord"). The handwriting and the three clef forms are very similar to those in No. 6. The watermarks are—(1) a shield bearing some fancy arms surmounted by a large crown and supported by two lions, as seen in so many MSS. of this period; and (2) the letters I. P.

11a. Additl. 30931, f. 81. Anthem ("In the midst of life"). Handwriting, clefs, and watermarks similar to No. 10a.

11b. Additl. 30931, ff. 61, 67. Two anthems (the first composed in 1688). The handwriting and clefs like those in 10b. The watermarks are both similar to those in 10a, except that all the second halves of the sheets are blank.



12. Bodleian Mus. MS., C. 28. This volume of Purcell's MSS. contains, among other things, two compositions in the same hand as Dr. Bridge's MS. described below (No. 15). It will be sufficient to say a few words about the second one, the Ode for Queen Mary's Birthday, 1689. Here, as in the Te Deum, all the original singers' names are given, and at the end "Finis, compos'd by Mr. Henry Purcell" (just like the writing at the end of No. 15), after which someone has added "own writing." There is only one watermark, the usual fancy arms, the other half of the sheet remaining blank. The metrical anthems, &c., for three or four voices, at the end of the volume, are not, as Novello states, autograph, but in the same hand as Additl. MS. 22100 ("Mr. Dolbin's book, 1681-2").

13. The "Yorkshire Feast Song," 1690, owned by Mr. W. H. Cummings. The clefs are similar to those in Nos. 6, 7, &c. The watermarks are, on one half of the sheet, the same arms as in 30932, f. 121 (No. 10), &c.; and on the other half the letters R. C. The capital P. is just like that in Purcell's signature in the Queen's MS. (No. 7), of which a fac-simile has been given.

14. Bodleian Mus. MS. C. 26, ff. 4*b*, 10. Two anthems, the first of which is certified as an autograph by Dr. Philip Hayes, and the second is undoubtedly one also, from the character of the corrections and alterations in it. The H. P. at the end of the latter is exactly like those in Purcell's signature just referred to. The clefs resemble those usually employed by Purcell. There is only one watermark, the arms which occur in No. 13, &c., with H. C. underneath them, the other half of each sheet being blank.

15. Te Deum and Jubilate, and a song, "When first Dorinda's piercing eyes," written on the back of the last leaf, recently acquired by Dr. Bridge, who has kindly lent it for examination. This is evidently a contemporary MS. for it has the names of the original singers, including Josiah Bouchier, who died a month after Purcell. The hand in which the greater part of the MS. is written differs considerably from all those described above, except, perhaps, No. 4, which is in Croft's hand. The principal clefs, &c., are as follows:—

The watermarks are—on one half of the sheet the oft-quoted arms, on the other half L. V. C. At the end is written, in 4 lines, one word over the other, "Finis, Mr.

In the middle of the MS. a second hand appears several times for a page or two. It is found also in a very large volume of anthems and songs in the Fitzwilliam Museum, dated 1683 (30 G-10), where it is attributed to Dr. Blow; it appears also in Additl. 31453, bearing the date January, 1699; but none of them are at all like Blow's autograph dated November, 1695) in Additl. 31457. If the main body of this MS. is not in Purcell's hand it must have been dictated by him, or written under his supervision.

16. Additl. 30934, ff. 80-91b. Ode upon the Duke of Gloucester's Birthday, 1695. In the same hand as Nos. 10b, 11b, &c.; but with different watermarks from any previously mentioned, except that on one half of each sheet the same arms which occur in Dr. Bridge's MS., and elsewhere, are found.

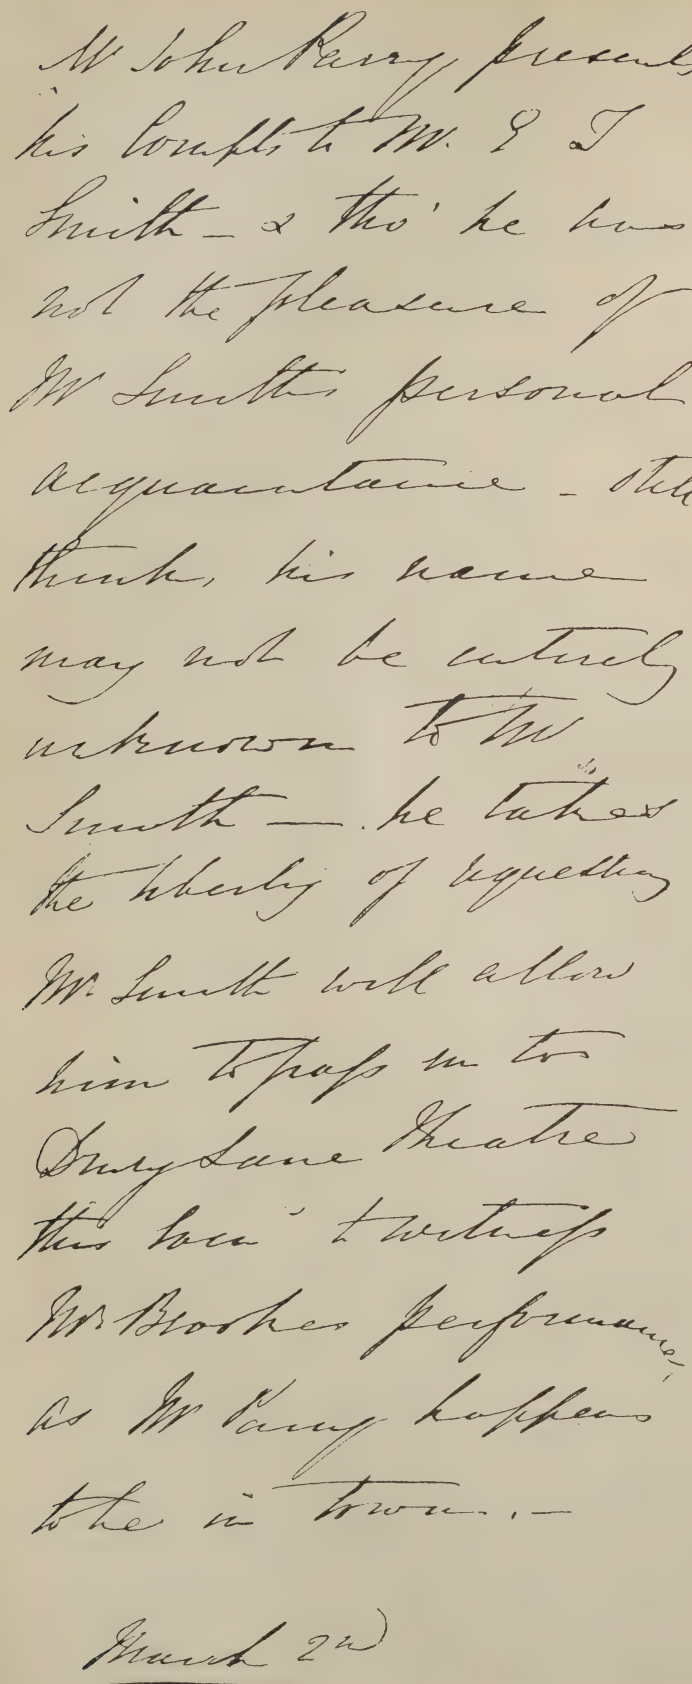
17. Additl. 5337, ff. 27-42. "The Musick in Bonduca" [1695] by Mr.

from a MS. which belonged to Sir John Hawkins. The G clef is much like the one usually employed by Purcell, but the C clef is quite different—

The watermarks are—(1) a lion in a round shield, and (2) the letters A. I. The name written at the beginning (see fac-simile) is in the same hand as the music, but neither bears much resemblance to the composer's usual writing. It may possibly be in Dr. Blow's hand (compare Additl. 31457).

18. Bodleian Mus. MS., C. 27. "Song for the Duke of Gloster's Birthday," in the same two hands as Dr. Bridge's Te Deum (No. 15), with names of the original singers. At the end is written, "Made.....by Mr. Henry Purcell, July ye 24th, 1695." There are several watermarks, all of which (except the letters I. D.) occur among the best authenticated autographs. We believe the original of this Birthday song to be No. 16 (described above).

19. Bodleian Mus. MS. A. 1. "Benedicite," from the Morning Service in B flat, for four voices. The handwriting, clefs, and initials H. P. closely resemble those in the Buckingham Palace MS. The watermarks are the same as in Nos. 3 and 7, substituting the letters M. T. for those there.



20. Fitzwilliam MS. 32, F. 23. A very thin volume containing organ accompaniments to various anthems, &c. Among others are the following, evidently in Purcell's hand: (1) "Holy, Holy," and "Gloria" in G, and an anthem, "O give thanks," at the beginning of which is written in the same hand, "H. Purcell, 1693," the capital P being exactly like that in the Buckingham Palace MS. (No. 7).

It will be seen, then, that Purcell's handwriting must be divided into two periods. The first, of which but few specimens remain (see Nos. 10a and 11a), probably dates from several years before 1680 (in which the beginning of No. 6 was written). The handwriting here is irregular and unformed, but fairly legible; the older form of e is used, but the most distinctive feature in this hand is the peculiar bass clef (see fac-simile under No. 10a). The watermark mostly in use at this period is the Fool's head, &c. In the second period the hand is more formed, and the general direction of the letters, more especially the long ones, is upright, not to say perpendicular. The modern e is employed with few exceptions, and those almost entirely at the beginning of the period. The F clef used differs very slightly from that in common use at the time. The G and C clefs, which, with very slight variations, are common to both periods, have been reproduced above. Of the later watermarks little can be said. The I. H. S. surmounted by a cross and the plain fleur-de-lys are the most common.

FROM MY STUDY.

The reproduction of a letter from Madame Grisi to her London manager, given with the present issue as an extra supplement, can hardly fail to interest readers. There is no doubt of the situation out of which the letter sprang. Rightly or wrongly, Grisi looked upon the proposal to offer her a testimonial as a hint that it was time to withdraw from before the public. So, no doubt, it was, but she could not see it. She clung passionately, as the letter shows, to her position and work, and here we listen as she pleads, with almost hysterical force, for a further lease. There is something exceedingly pathetic in the post-script. The veteran artist is still ready to embark upon a fresh enterprise if only by so doing she can keep the stage. But it was too late for any manager to risk bringing out a new opera with a prima donna who, though possessing a great name, had lost her youth and many of her resources. How slow Grisi was to accept the inevitable appeared in 1866, when she made a disastrous re-entry at Her Majesty's Theatre, under Mr. Mapleson. I seem to feel the painfulness of that cruel spectacle even now.

Last month I promised a reproduction of a ticket for one of Haydn's concerts in London, signed by the master; but the resources of photography do not go so far. The ticket is printed in blue ink, and blue, I am informed, is a colour which comes out white from the camera. I am constrained, therefore, to offer a substitute; and as the name of John Parry has several times appeared in these columns of late, it is not inappropriate to give the accompanying fac-simile note. The occasion of the document is, no doubt, trivial; but the terms in which Parry prefers his modest request, and the whole style of the communication, are exceedingly characteristic of the man—of his elaborate, old-fashioned politeness, and of a certain primness and precision which those who remember him at the Gallery of Illustration thirty years ago will not fail to appreciate.

As far as I am aware, no reference was made during the late Purcell Celebration to an Ode on the master's death written by John Sheffield, Duke of Buckinghamshire. This nobleman, a son of the Earl of Mulgrave, was born in 1650, married a natural daughter of James II., passed a busy life in camp and court, died in 1721, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, where is a monument to his memory, with an epitaph composed by himself. During his career the Duke wrote much prose and verse, all of which his widow thought worthy of print. "His pious relict," says Horace Walpole, caustically, "was always purchasing places for him, herself, and their son, in every suburb of the temple of Fame—a tenure against which, of all others, quo-warrantos are sure to take place." The Duke's works were issued in two volumes quarto, and also in two volumes octavo, 1729 and 1740. His poetic ability has been lauded by such men as Dryden, Addison, and Pope, but Johnson sums up his qualities thus: "Criticism discovers him to be a writer that sometime glimmers but rarely shines; feebly laborious, and at best but pretty. To be great he hardly tries; to be gay is hardly in his power. His verses are often insipid, but his memoirs are lively and agreeable; he had the perspicuity and elegance of an historian, but not the fire and fancy of a poet." As to the Duke's personal character, Johnson says that it "is not to be proposed as worthy of imitation," and continues: "His religion he may be supposed to have learned from Hobbes, and his morality was such as naturally proceeds from loose opinions. His sentiments with respect to women he picked up in the court of Charles, and his principles concerning property were such as a gaming-table supplies." But much may be forgiven Buckinghamshire for his verses on the poor organist of Westminster Abbey, and the sentiments they contain. I quote the Ode in its entirety:—

ODE ON THE DEATH OF HENRY PURCELL.

Good angels snatched him eagerly on high;
Joyful they flew, singing and soaring through the sky,
Teaching his new-fledg'd soul to fly,
While we, alas! lamenting lie.
He went musing all along,
Composing new their heavenly song.
Awhile his skilful notes loud hallelujahs drown'd,
But soon they ceas'd their own to catch his pleasing sound.
David himself improv'd the harmony,
David in sacred story so renown'd,
No less for musick than for poetry;
Genius sublime in either art,
Crown'd with applause surpassing all desert,
A man just after God's own heart.
If human cares are lawful to the blest,
Already settled in eternal rest,
Needs must he wish that Purcell only might
Have liv'd to set what he vouchsaf'd to write:
For sure the noblest thirst of fame
With the frail body never dies,
But with the soul ascends the skies,
From whence at first it came.
'Tis sure no little proof we have
That part of us survives the grave,
And in our fame below still bears a share.
Why is the future else so much our care,
Ev'n in our last moments of despair,
And death despis'd for fame by all the wise and brave?
Oh! all ye blest harmonious choir,
Who Pow'r Almighty only love, and only that admire,
Look down with pity from your peaceful bow'r
On this sad isle perplex'd,
And ever, ever vex'd
With anxious cares of trifles, wealth and pow'r.
In our rough minds due reverence infuse,
For sweet melodious sounds and each harmonious muse.
Music exalts man's nature, and inspires
High elevated thoughts, or gentle, kind desires.

The bold idea which represents the angels as hushing their song to hear Purcell's may be compared with that of Dryden in his Ode on the same occasion—

They handed him along,
And all the way he taught, and all the way they sung.

It is of interest to add that this Duke of Buckinghamshire, on retiring from public life, built Buckingham House, in St. James's Park, on the site now occupied by Buckingham Palace.

The following interesting communication has come to hand from Dr. Furnival:—

"Of Handel, at an Oratorio in London, in 1750, there is a short description in Madame Fiquet du Bocage's 'Letters concerning England, Holland, and Italy,' translated from the French (London, 1770). At Vol. I., pp. 14, 15, the accomplished writer, who was a member of the Academies of Padua, Bologna, Rome, and Lyons, says on April 15, 1750:—

"'The Oratorio, or pious concert, pleases us highly. English words* are sung by Italian performers and accompanied by a variety of instruments. Handel is the soul of it: when he makes his appearance, two wax lights are carried before him, which are laid upon his organ. Amidst a loud clapping of hands he seats himself, and the whole band of music strikes up exactly at the same moment. At the interludes he plays Concertos of his own composition, either alone or accompanied by the orchestra. These are equally admirable for the harmony and the execution. The Italian opera, in three acts, gives us much less pleasure.'

"'Handel is the soul of it': well said, Madame du Bocage. We salute you!"

Henry Angelo, fencing-master, amateur actor, and man about town, left behind him two volumes of gossip which he styled his "Reminiscences." They were published in 1830, and may still be met with from time to time in the second-hand book shops. Angelo, like his father before him, made many distinguished acquaintances in the exercise of his profession, and was a man of sufficient address to find his way into the society of the day as a tolerated person. He dearly loved a lord, and grovelled at the feet of royalty; but withal, as his writings show, was a man of high spirits and intelligence, who could appreciate really good company as well as that which was good merely by position. Angelo's "Reminiscences" contain some interesting notes on musical men of the day, and I now propose to myself the Hornerian occupation of picking out the plums.

The Angelos, father and son, attached to themselves many artists of renown, among them Bartolozzi and Cipriani, who were matched on the side of music by Johann Christian Bach (whom Henry often calls Sebastian) and Abel. Here is the first mention of these famous men:

Bach and Abel, two distinguished musicians and composers; the first, the celebrated performer on the harpsichord; the other, the memorable professor on that now obsolete instrument the viol de gamba, were equally intimate, at this period, with the elder Angelo. These worthies, too, came together to try their fortunes in England, and for some time were inmates at our house. Well do I remember the delightful evenings which for years were frequent under my paternal roof, when they, with Bartolozzi and Cipriani, formed a little friendly party, and amused themselves with drawing, music, and conversation until long after midnight. Cipriani used to make sketches of heads, to which Bartolozzi would, with red, black, and white chalks, add the effect.

On one occasion the Angelos, father, mother, and son, were guests of the famous Duchess of Queensbury, wife of the no less renowned

* "This language appears to be admirably adapted to music. The ingenious Mr. Addison observes that its conciseness suits with the natural taciturnity of his countrymen; that the hissing, for which it is remarkable, resembles an instrument with strings, and that the articulate pronunciation of other languages resembles the music of wind instruments."

"Old Q." We get a glimpse of these eccentric personages—of the Duke as "a very tall, thin figure, with a short-skirted frock, gold-laced hat, and high leather gaiters"; of the Duchess, then near eighty, as "dressed in a Quaker coloured silk and black hood, walking and talking, with the utmost gaiety, with every one." Angelo continues:

In the evening there was a little music, and my mother, at the instance of the Dutchess, sang Allan Ramsey's song of Patie,* to the great pleasure of this ancient and most noble couple. In speaking of this pretty pastoral ditty, it may, perhaps, amuse the amateurs of musical anecdote to be told that Sebastian (Johann Christian) Bach, who gave instruction to her late Majesty, set this song, with an accompaniment, expressly for my mother, and I have often heard her sing it with her gentle voice, whilst Bach played the accompaniment. Abel sometimes joined his friend on the viol de gamba. I may be forgiven if I add that, even in his latter years, this was my father's favourite ballad; when my mother sang it he would often strum the accompaniment on his guitar.

Young Angelo was taken to Paris by Abel for the purpose of being placed under a French tutor, and with them travelled two German musicians, who were returning to their own country after amassing a competency in England. These men were Bere, a clarinettist, and Vise, a flautist.

I remember each silently watching the receding white cliffs of Dover, and each wiping the tear of grateful retrospect from his eye. Besides these professors were the elder Mr. Cramer, of musical celebrity, and his son, the present Mr. John Cramer, then about four or five years old. I have his figure yet before me, a very interesting child in a nankeen suit.

The appointed tutor of Henry Angelo came to sup with the party in Paris.

It is no caricature of his person to assert that he looked the character of the miserable vendor of the deadly drug to Shakespeare's Romeo, and the part he performed at the supper-table spoke pretty intelligibly that his necessities were somewhat allied to those of that miserable apothecary. Abel bore a tall, big, portly person, with a waistcoat under which might easily have been buttoned twin brothers such as my Monsieur Boileau.

This advantage, no doubt, prompted the musical professor to illustrate the elegant manners of the period by styling the poor Frenchman a "snub-nosed maître de langue."

Among the Angelo acquaintances were Richard Brinsley Sheridan and Linley, with whose musical daughter, as everybody knows, the author of the "School for Scandal" ran away:

I recollect that my father and mother felt themselves in a delicate dilemma with the principals of both families for some time after the elopement of Miss Linley with her enterprising lover. Old Mr. Sheridan, who had naturally planned romantic schemes for the advancement of his highly gifted son, disapproved of his marriage with a public singer, and the elder Linley, on the other hand, lost by the match the emoluments which he was then deriving from the celebrity of his sweet daughter's extraordinary talents as a vocal performer. . . . The young poet, Sheridan, indeed, had, by his captivating manners and superior address, deprived the family of the Linleys of, in every sense, its greatest treasure. Putting this consideration aside, the parental appeals of each house were regarded as idle complaints; for, as old Jonathan Tyers, the proprietor of Vauxhall, said: "Who is to settle the precedence between the family consequence of the green-room and the orchestra."

Angelo confirms the statement that Sheridan objected to his wife's singing, even in private circles:

Garrick could not endure to see his amiable spouse "trip it on the light fantastic toe," neither could young Sheridan endure to hear his sweet bride "warble her native wood-notes wild," though, to do justice to her memory, art had amply improved her strains. Some few months after their nuptials, our family, the Linleys, and Willoughby Lacy, spent an evening at Christmas at Richard Brinsley's house in Orchard Street. We kept it up to a late hour, and, music making part of the after-supper entertainment, Mamma Linley asked her daughter to sing a certain little favourite air, but a single glance from her juvenile lord and master kept her mute.

What a genial Christmas host was R. B. S., to be sure!

Something is said in these volumes of the celebrated Parson Bate, divine, dramatist, and critic, Angelo stating, amongst other things, that he was the first to discern the merit of Shield, and chose him before all others to compose music for his "Flitch of Bacon."

Concerning Gainsborough, I find much of interest; this, for example:

Gainsborough was an enthusiastic admirer of music, and, though certainly no musician, yet his love for sweet sounds was such that he tried his native skill upon almost every instrument. He was too capricious to sit to study any one methodically, though, having a nice ear, he could perform an air on the fiddle, the guitar, the harpsichord, or the flute. Under Fischer, his son-in-law, he did take a few lessons upon the hautboy, or clarinet, I forget which, but made nothing of it. . . . Bach, who had a true German share of dry humour, used to sit and endure his miserable attempts, and, laughing in his sleeve, exclaim, "Bravo!" whilst Gainsborough, not at all abashed at his irony, would proceed, labouring hard at any particular key, be it major or be it minor, and drolly exclaim, "Now for Purcell's chaunt! Now a specimen of old Bird (Byrd)!" "Dat is deblish fine!" cried Bach. "Now for a touch of Kent, and old Henry Lawes," added Gainsborough; when Bach, his patience worn out, would exclaim, "Now dat is too bad; dere is no law, by goles! why de gombany is to listen to your murder of all dese ancient gomposers?" Then, getting up from his seat, he would run his finger rattling along all the keys, and, pushing the painter from his seat, would sit himself in his place and flourish voluntaries as though he was inspired.

Bach once called upon Gainsborough and found him in his studio very red in the face with blowing into a bassoon. What followed Angelo relates:

Bach stood astounded. "Pote it away, man; pote it away. Do you want to burst yourself, like the frog in the fable? De defil! it is only fit for the lungs of a country blackschmidt." "Nay, now," exclaimed Gainsborough, "it is the richest bass in the world. Now do listen again." "Listen," added Bach, "mine friendt, I did listen at your door in the passage, and py all the powers above, as I hobe to be saved, it is just for all the world as the praying of a jackass." "Why you have no ear, man," exclaimed Gainsborough, "no more than an adder. Come, then (taking the clarinet)"—— "Baw, baw," exclaimed the musician, "vorse and vorse; no more of your canarding, 'tis as a duck; by Gar! 'tis vorse as a goose!"

Angelo quotes from Jackson of Exeter as to the great painter's strange musical fancies, one of which was a craving to possess any instrument played by a fine performer, as though he could buy the skill with it. At Bath he purchased Giardini's violin, he also secured Abel's viol-da-gamba, and his son-in-law's hautboy. "The next time I saw Gainsborough," adds Jackson, "it was in the character of King David. He had heard a performer on the harp at Bath—the performer was soon left harpless."

* From "The Gentle Shepherd."

Angelo gives us a glimpse of the social meetings for music which sprang up in the City after the success of Thomas Britton's gatherings. They were held at taverns:

I remember one, at the Old Queen's Arms Tavern, situated on the North side of Newgate Street, to which, on Thursday nights, admission was obtained by tickets at two shillings each. The performers at this time were in part professional and others were amateurs. Here Shore, the renowned trumpet, used to perform, and Fischer occasionally gave them a solo on his oboe—two such players as may not be heard again for a hundred years. Here, as I have been informed, at one period Corelli's quartets were played in genuine style; latterly the Society sunk into second and third-rate performers, and, I believe, the Concerts ceased about thirty years ago. Those, the remaining few of the old school of citizens, who, like myself, delight in reminiscences of these past days, may remember the social groups who took their suppers in the antiquated parlour, after the Concert had closed.

Here I must stop, but there are still plums for the picking in Henry Angelo's chatty pages.

ESSAYS IN MUSICAL CRITICISM.

In our last number we furnished our readers with samples of up-to-date musical criticism of the "finicking" and "truculent" order. Recent events have conclusively shown the inconvenience attaching to the adoption of the latter style. For the benefit therefore of such of our readers as aspire to sit in judgment on their contemporaries without the risk of appearing in the agony columns of the leading morning papers, we venture to submit examples of a less perilous kind:—

III.

The Indiscriminately Eulogistic.

The advantages conferred on metropolitan music-lovers by such an institution as the Royalty Concerts are so numerous and notorious that the task of criticism may be said almost to savour of supererogation. On the other hand, to omit detailed mention of a single item in the rich musical menu provided last night by the energetic and enterprising director of this noble institution might so easily be misconstrued that we readily undertake what is always a grateful and congenial duty. And, first of all, let us cordially compliment the management on the success with which they have striven to combat monotony by the introduction of new and thoroughly topical features into their programme. The initial item—a Whistling Quartet by the Siffleurs Parisiens—left nothing to be desired on the score of purity of expression, penetration of tone, and unanimity of ensemble. After five recalls these talented artists gratified the audience by another exquisite exhibition of their sibilatory prowess, the piece chosen being an arrangement, as a four-part song, of the familiar "Ave Maria" of Bach-Gounod. Madame Claudia Popkins, who followed with Tarley Bindells's pathetic ballad "Only an Oyster-catcher," is a prime favourite with the Royalty audience, and seldom, if ever, has her luscious portamento been displayed to greater advantage than in the realistic refrain of this delicious ditty. Here, again, the demand for an encore was imperative, and Madame Popkins graciously responded with "The Lonely Limpet," in which the sorrows of the isolated crustacean are so tenderly depicted in the lyric of Leonard Potère and the melody of Beppo Francatelli. The appearance of the veteran tragedian, Mr. Storn-Barmer, who had been specially engaged for this occasion to recite "Three Blind Mice," was the signal for a wild outburst of enthusiasm lasting for several minutes. The simple charm of this classical morceau was admirably brought out by Mr. Storn-Barmer's refined enunciation, and as the audience, like the voracious Oliver, clamoured for more, the talented artist good-naturedly gave, with wonderful effect, the whole of the first book of "Paradise Lost." At the close of this most impressive performance, which only occupied three-quarters of an hour, agreeable relief was afforded by the gratuitous distribution of a choice assortment of superb sandwiches thoughtfully provided by the generous impresario, after which the enormous audience, like giants refreshed, devoted their attention to Master Philidor Chanticleer's electrifying rendering of the new patriotic song "Who dares to twist the Lion's Tail?" Master Chanticleer, who wore the uniform of a Field Marshal, and employed one of the new patent megalophonic vocal chord expanders, recently invented by Mr. Edison, excited the most unbridled enthusiasm among his auditors, and after a double encore, sent the house into fresh paroxysms of patriotic ecstasy by his clever performance of a hornpipe to the accompaniment of the pipers of the Mounted Marines. Some graceful feats of conjuring by Professor Trecardi, pianoforte solos by Mr. Maxim Krupp, a short sermon by Dr. Barker (to which the versatile divine added a performance on the flying trapeze by way of an encore), and some sensational headers from the organ loft into a tank on the edge of the platform by Miss Godiva Plunger, brought the first part of the programme to a close at a few minutes past twelve o'clock. In the interval, which was pleasantly diversified by the ejection of a gentleman who had incautiously observed that his wife's first cousin had married a Dutchman, a brief but charming hypnotic séance was conducted by Madame Pippa Passmore, who threw one of the attendants into a seven days' trance, and promised that the subject should be left on the platform until his release at the next Royalty Concert. Madame Passmore also contributed materially to the delight of the audience by gracefully swallowing several gold watches, a tuning-fork, and a small musical box—the strains of which were distinctly audible for three minutes after the act of deglutition. The normal course of the programme was now resumed with the re-appearance of the "Siffleurs Parisiens," who, with an accompaniment of organ, euphonium, and zoetrope, gave their wonderfully chaste and exhilarating entertainment known as "Clapham Junction in a Fog," in which the whole répertoire of the modern engine-driver was simulated with the utmost possible dynamic intensity. Mr. Bavius Nixone, the gifted Australian tenor, who is nothing if not original, then charmed the vast assemblage by his wonderfully impressive rendering of the "Hailstone" chorus, arranged as a solo by Dr. Jasper Barnum. Hypersensitive critics may be found who object to this method of procedure as running counter to the intentions of the composer, but Mr. Nixone was completely vindicated by the result of his bold experiment. Clad in the uniform of a British admiral, he held the attention of the audience from the outset, and as the demand for an encore could not have been refused without risk of a riot, generously complied by giving Lemmens Quosh's great patriotic song, "Off to Filibuster." The grey dawn was just beginning to break as Mr. Storn-Barmer ascended the platform steps, and by the time he had ended his sumptuous and sonorous recitation of Tennyson's "In Memoriam," with, as an encore, "Augustus was a chubby lad," many of the audience were sleeping peacefully in their seats. It was with unfeigned regret that we were obliged to tear ourselves away from this touching scene, the cast-iron rules which regulate the hours at which a daily paper goes to press being our only excuse for this apparent act of desertion. Before, however, concluding this necessarily imperfect notice of a brilliant and exquisitely artistic concert, it would savour of the basest ingratitude did we not express our deep indebtedness to the courtesy of the intelligent and urbane official who presides over the destinies of the cloak room. Thanks to his services we were enabled to face the inclement atmosphere of the small hours in a hat and coat far better adapted to the rigours of the situation than those in which we had arrived some seven hours previously.

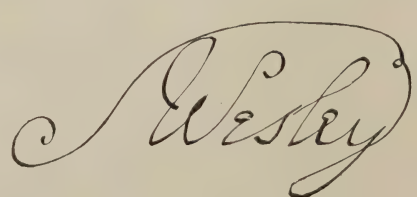
IV.

(The Sartorial.)

Dearest Dolabella,—You will, I am sure, be dying to hear about the dresses worn at the "Creation"—the oratorio, I mean—which was given by the Sacred Philharmonic Society, at the Mendelssohn Hall, last night. My dear Dol., Alpatti's dress was a perfect dream of delight. Just fancy: the bodice of crushed Cape gooseberry satin, veiled in accordion-pleated chiffon—so appropriate to a musician!—of an Esterhazy brown tint; you know, of course, that dear old Haydn was music-master or something or other to one of the Esterhazys in the fifteenth century, or was it the seventeenth? The skirt was of very bright pink satin, with a hem of silver, and silver bands round the bodice, and at the back of the waist two chou bows of earthquake blue satin gave the whole thing ineffable chic. Miss Hilda Buttson, the contralto, was gowned in electric plum velvet, with salmon-coloured tabs across the shoulder. As the evening was rather chilly she wore a handsome opera wrap of pale green plush richly trimmed with chinchilla. I was rather surprised to notice that Mr. Edward Davies, the tenor, only wore two studs in his enamelled shirt front; but I am told that it renders the production of his high A's much easier. Mr. John Stanley's dress waistcoat was cut a shade lower than usual, but otherwise he was as artistic and delightful as ever. Pretty Mrs. Ormolu was, as usual, a conspicuous figure in the stalls, where I also noticed Lord Crotchet, Miss Minnie Mumm, M. Tostikoffski, and dear old Lady Double Barr. In fact, I had so much to do in "memorising" the dresses and nodding to friends that I had really no time to listen to the music, which was of course played and sung to perfection. And now, dear, let me give you the following original recipe for a tomato omelette; you will find it excellent after singing or bicycling: Take ten tomatoes, and soak them in boiling water for 1½ hour, then stew them for 1½ more, adding a pint of cream, three blades of mace, six peppercorns, and a knuckle-duster. Now take them carefully from the liquor and place them gently but firmly in a hair sieve, rub them through and fry in hot clean lard, arrange on a napkin, and give liberally to the poor.—Ever, dearest Dolabella, your doting cousin, Araminta. P.S.—On looking casually at my programme I find that there is no contralto in the "Creation," so I must have seen Miss Buttson somewhere else.



BACH AND WESLEY.

An Interesting Bequest.

The British Museum will shortly receive a very valuable addition to its library under the will of the late Miss Eliza Wesley, daughter of Samuel ("old Sam") Wesley. The bequest consists principally of manuscripts by John Sebastian Bach and Samuel Wesley. Of surpassing interest is an autograph (nearly complete) of Bach's "48" (Book II.) in the handwriting of the great Cantor. These MS. sheets, which are in a splendid state of preservation, formerly belonged to Clementi. After his death they passed to Mr. J. G. Emmett, then to his daughter, Miss Emmett, who bequeathed them to her friend, the late Miss Wesley. There is no doubt of their authenticity. Mendelssohn saw them when he was in London in 1842, and at once pronounced them to be in the handwriting of Bach; and Clementi, Moscheles, and Sterndale Bennett were of the same opinion. An account of these precious manuscripts, which are not mentioned by Spitta, is given by Mr. Frederick Westlake in Sir George Grove's "Dictionary of Music," Vol. IV., 483. We understand that the British Museum does not possess a single note in Bach's autograph, therefore this gift will be specially welcome, apart from its inherent value.

From Bach, "THE MAN," as Wesley called him, to Samuel Wesley, his great disciple in England, is a natural transition. We have only space to mention a few of the many MSS. of Wesley's which, with those of Bach, will soon become the property of the nation. The original MS. of the oratorio of "Ruth," in the boy's handwriting, which Master Sammy Wesley composed between "the ages of six and eight," is of special interest, and has often been referred to. The first page bears the following statement written by the little composer's father, the Rev. Charles Wesley, the hymn-writer: "This oratorio was composed by Samuel Wesley, when eight years of age, never having been taught music or composition, and many of y^e^ airs completed when only six years old."

A MS. symphony, dated "1802," and scored for small orchestra—flutes, oboes, bassoons, horns, drums, and strings—is a remarkable work for the period at which it was written, and fully deserves to be performed. It would seem to be the duty of the Philharmonic Society to give its attention to this specimen of English symphonic music. In addition to much other music, we find the manuscripts of Wesley's lectures, all fully written out, which he gave at the Surrey Institution and elsewhere in the early years of the century. Here is the characteristic handwriting—"rough-hewn pothooks and hangers"—to use Wesley's words—and signature, of which we give a fac-simile:*

Two albums—one huge volume containing many portraits—are full of interest. Here are to be found the signatures of many notabilities—Dickens, Macready, Garibaldi, and others—and many famous musicians, which were specially contributed to the smaller book at

* It is evident that Wesley wrote the initial letter of his signature—the "S"—as an extended curl of the "y."

Miss Wesley's request. Mendelssohn's contribution is so characteristic as to be worth reproducing:

QUARTET?

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.

London, September 7, 1837.

We invite a solution of the above from any of our readers who possess canonic facility; but we would draw their special attention to the significant query (?) following the title—whereby "hangs a tale," although it appears at the head of Mendelssohn's album-leaf.

F. G. E.

Further proofs that the long-standing prejudice against English music is rapidly giving place to feelings more worthy of the countrymen of Beethoven were afforded recently in connection with the Concert of English music given in Berlin by Professor Villiers Stanford, with the assistance of Messrs. Borwick and Plunket Greene and the famous Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. The programme is given in our foreign column, but in order to show how well the music was appreciated we purpose here to give a few extracts from the Berlin press. All the papers are quite frankly appreciative of the Concert as a whole, high praise being given not only to the music, but to Messrs. Borwick and Greene, and to Dr. Stanford in his capacity as conductor. Dr. Otto Lessmann, in his Allgemeine Musik Zeitung, says: "Parry's tragic Overture is a work distinguished by powerful invention, excellent workmanship, and characteristic treatment of the orchestra. Mackenzie's 'Britannia' Overture, a restlessly onward storming (ruhelos vorwärts stürmendes), witty and effective pièce d'occasion, is less remarkable for original thematic material than for the ingenious (geistvoll) use of folk-tunes and the very clever treatment of the orchestra. Dr. Stanford produced a Pianoforte Concerto, a Symphony, and some very interesting Irish folk-songs, harmonised and orchestrated by himself in a masterly manner. The Concerto and Symphony are built on classical models. The former offers a grateful task to the soloist, and to the listener well-written music which grows out of characteristic themes. There is a certain pathos about the first movement; noble lyric sentiment dominates the broadly conceived Adagio, and the third movement rushes past in the gayest mood. The Symphony is genuine and proper programme music. . . . The work is thoroughly noble in invention and workmanship and the treatment of the orchestra displays as much experience as taste."

The opening portion of the next extract—from the Berliner Zeitung—ought to be printed in gold letters on the walls of every English music-school and taken to heart by those of our young composers whose style has been too exclusively formed on the model of living German composers: "It is said that the English fog is not conducive to musical production. This is a prejudice. We know works by distinguished German composers in which there is more 'fog' than in the productions which were introduced to us last evening. Dr. Stanford's Symphony is the work of an erudite composer who has complete command over the orchestral means of expression, and always draws upon a richly endowed imagination. The Allegro grazioso especially is delightfully fresh, and the Andante remarkable for melodic beauty." Thus the Vossische Zeitung: "The Symphony, as a whole, is thoroughly sympathetic. The naturalness and spontaneity of Dr. Stanford's musical language produce a much more agreeable effect—at least upon me—than the pretentious utterances of many other composers. . . . The programme included, further, a tragic Overture by Hubert Parry, which interested by the breadth and power of its musical ideas, and the Overture 'Britannia,' by A. C. Mackenzie, a thoroughly merry and entertaining composition which is, moreover, excellently written." The Neueste Nachrichten goes so far as to say: "The Symphony belongs, in our opinion, to the most important creations of its kind since Beethoven, and we hope to meet with this masterpiece again right soon. It is very difficult to discuss details after a single hearing of such a work; but we must specially mention the second movement as a mood-picture (Stimmungsbild) of wonderful charm (Zauber)."

The next extract is from the Berliner Börsen-Courier: "After Mackenzie's Overture 'Britannia,' which created a singularly fresh impression and is very effectively orchestrated, the Concert closed with Stanford's Symphony. It must be said of this work that it betrays throughout a seriously thinking, distinguished musician, who has complete command of both the arrangement of his material and the means of expression. As especially successful, we must mention the second movement, Allegro grazioso, which proved effective through its charming themes and piquant orchestration." The praise of the Deutsche Tages Zeitung is most generous: "A splendidly successful work, full of sparkling life and richly flowing inventive powers is the 'Britannia' Overture, by Mackenzie, of which we hope, as we do of Stanford's great D major Symphony, that it may become part of the musical home treasure (Hausschatz) of the German people. The most powerful impression of the evening was made upon us by the Symphony, which must be counted amongst the most important modern orchestral works. . . . Before an audience of unprejudiced musicians this work ought to elicit real storms of enthusiasm. Thoroughly modern in form and contents, it is worthy of being placed side by side with the best classical models as regards its noble melodic contents and the originality of treatment of the musical ideas. . . . We feel free from the suspicion of over-estimating what is foreign, and we have always demanded that preference should be given to German art; but when what is foreign presents itself in such perfection as in the work of this English composer, we are the first to demand the deserved tribute of acknowledgment for the genius of such a master." Waning space warns us that these extracts must suffice, otherwise we could have quoted many others. Though nothing new, it is always saddening to think that prophets should receive greater honour in other countries than in their own.

The present state of the question of musical pitch in England is eminently unsatisfactory. Following the initiative of the Philharmonic Society, the Diapason Normal has been adopted by other London leading societies, but it is obvious that much confusion and inconvenience must remain until the matter is settled by official authority. Mr. Blaikley's thoughtful and excellent paper read last month at the Royal Academy of Music, a report of which appears in the present number, shows distinctly that Government authority is not only reasonable but necessary in this matter. We are provided with a scientifically defined standard wherewith to weigh our food and measure our garments, and it is surely but consistent that the most intangible of the arts that so frequently appeal to our ears should also have official recognition of a like character. Moreover, for the last twelve months the army authorities have been in the anomalous position of disobeying their own regulation, which orders that the army pitch should be the same as that of the Philharmonic Society. Is not this sufficient to make the scarlet bosom palpitate, and stir the martinets to action? The matter is not one of recent or rapid growth. The Diapason Normal has reigned in France for thirty-six years, and has gradually but surely won the support of leading musicians of all countries, including now our own. It is, therefore, no new thing, but a well tried standard from which there is little chance of deviations being accepted in the future. Several attempts have been made to introduce this standard into England, the earliest practical effort of importance being the Oratorio Concerts given, at the suggestion of Mr. Sims Reeves, by Messrs. Novello in 1869, in St. James's Hall, for which the original organ there was built. These performances, conducted by Sir (then Mr.) Joseph Barnby, have been apparently forgotten by our contemporaries. If the army had adopted the pitch at that time it would have entailed far less expense than at present. But the opportunity was permitted to slip by, and, as in all such cases, any endeavour to change the military pitch will now be more costly. If the army refuses to alter its present pitch, it will probably result in those instrumentalists who play for leading choral societies having to buy new instruments of the Diapason Normal. Conductors may yield to the pressure of circumstances and remain faithful to the high pitch, but if the prime donne insist, the valiant members of the British Army will have to capitulate or retreat. Maxim guns will not move ladies' heels, and if they decide to wear French ones—they will.

Our contemporary, the Daily News—to whom congratulations—celebrated its Jubilee on the 21st ult. by issuing a fac-simile of its first number. Charles Dickens was the first editor, and his father-in-law, George Hogarth (the author of a poor history of the Philharmonic Society, of which he was for many years the Secretary), was the musical critic. Music figured largely in this initial number, bearing date "January 21, 1846." An article, exceeding two columns, headed "Music," began: "We intend to make this journal a record of the progress of an art which certainly, in our day, is more generally cultivated (whether more advantageously or no is another matter) than at any former period, not in this country only, but throughout the civilised world. . . . We shall do the best we can [in the matter of criticism, &c.] without any hope of being exempt from the errors and frailties of our neighbours." This is delightfully modest in comparison with the trumpetings of the "new" critics of the present day. After a long quotation from old Morley's "A plaine and easie," the article gives some very readable historical information, and concludes with words of encouragement to, and in appreciation of, "the younger professors." Amongst the announcements is one of Jullien's Concerts at Covent Garden, when "The Andante, Allegro, and Storm, from Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony," and "Beethoven's celebrated Valse" are announced to be played, in addition to violin and pianoforte performances by "Signor Sivori and Mr. Hatton," who, of course, is John Liptrot Hatton, of "To Anthea" fame. An interesting advertisement is that of "Novello's Cheap Musical Classics. A series of works by the great masters in Vocal score and Pianoforte accompaniment, without curtailment, from the original Works. Published at about 1d. per page." Mr. J. Alfred Novello was then located at 69, Dean Street, Soho, where the large and important printing operations of the firm are now carried on.

Peculiar significance was attached to the recent annual Conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, held on this occasion at Edinburgh, by the fact of the President being Sir Alexander Mackenzie, to whom the meeting must have been one of those rare moments in life when fruition of endeavour is realised. It was but natural, therefore, that his presidential address should be partly of a personal nature, and must have brought him very close to the hearts of his countrymen, and, for that matter, of those who had come from "across the border"; for it may be confidently said that no musician is held in greater esteem wherever the civilising art of St. Cecilia holds sway. Amongst the most important achievements of Sir Alexander Mackenzie may be numbered his foundation of a new Scottish School of Music, which, although young, has brought forth works of the highest class and is rich with promise for the future. That he is regarded as its founder was incidentally shown by his confession that "one of the treasures of my little library is a score by Hans von Bülow, and on its title-page is written, 'To the founder of a Scottish School,' date 1877, that is nearly nineteen years ago. It is not so very extraordinary a thing that one of the two pioneers of Wagnerism, one of the most advanced musicians of his time, should have thought it proper to encourage me in my early attempts to work upon our national music, because he was a many-sided man, who knew very well that national music was already asserting itself under the influence of his master, Franz Liszt." To which he, however, added that "I only mention this to prove that he erred in naming me as the first who had worked in that field. James Dewar was the first Scottish musician who, by intuition, prophetically realised not only the simple grace and beauty of our native music, but the additional charms with which the art of the trained musician could invest it; and his credit is the greater that he had no Liszt, no Smetana before his mind as a prototype." Posterity, however, will probably decline to accept Dewar in this light. Referring to folk-songs, of which his country is so richly possessed, the President said: "In our own time—indeed during the last twenty years—music and its practice have passed through several phases and unlooked-for developments, not the least noteworthy of which is the remarkable effect made by the compositions having for their all-pervading flavour the characteristics pertaining to the primitive music of the various nationalities. Indeed, alongside of the much discussed 'lyric drama,' nothing in musical composition has been so successfully attempted, or claimed so much attention. Whether these attempts are signs of weakness or lack of originality, a turn in a wrong and downward direction, as some assert, I may not discuss. But the fact remains that much that is most powerfully striking in modern music has been undoubtedly called into being by those composers who are most strongly imbued with the rhythm and melodic spirit of the early music of the land of their birth. We should have had no Tschaïkowsky, no Dvorák, no Grieg if we had not learned to love and appreciate them in their most individual phases. Further, it is not only fitting, but just, that on occasions like the present, when musicians of many lands are linked together, that we should 'doff our bonnets' in memory of those men who worked, to some purpose too, in their generation, and whose names are in danger of being forgotten even by their professional successors. Music of their simple, touching, and joyous kind still lives, it is true; but much of the original substance is being rapidly crystallised out of recognition."

It is said that if you compliment a Frenchman he shrugs his shoulders, that an Italian bows, but that the only effect on the British-born is to call up a ghastly smile and excite suspicion. It is to be hoped, however, that the very gratifying words addressed by Sir William Muir and Professor Niecks to Sir Alexander, on the occasion of his being made the recipient of the Edinburgh University degree of Doctor of Music, produced a less disastrous effect. Certainly Sir Alexander could have had no suspicions aroused, for with all his modesty he must have been inwardly conscious that no one was more deserving of the honour than himself. When a man writes such works as "The Rose of Sharon," "The Story of Sayid," "The Cottar's Saturday Night," "Colomba," "The Troubadour," "The Dream of Jubal," "Bethlehem," "La belle Dame sans Merci," "The Pibroch," and the "Twelfth Night" and "Britannia" Overtures, any University may well be proud to add his name to the list of those who hold its degrees; and Professor Niecks said truly that "in honouring thus Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the University testifies to the high merits of his achievements, acknowledges the debt his country owes him, and points to an example to be followed."

We learn that a number of prominent English composers are about to bring out a series of high-class songs to replace those whose chief characteristics are their untruthfulness and weakness. Amongst the composers who have undertaken to contribute are mentioned Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Dr. Parry, Professor Stanford, Mr. Somervell, Dr. J. G. Bennett, Sir Joseph Barnby, Mr. Cowen, and Mr. MacCunn; but the fact seems to have been overlooked that a large number of delightful songs have already been published by all these estimable composers. The fact is, that there is no lack of fine and effective songs, but there is a want of their appreciation. Vocalists and publishers are more to blame for this than the public. The large majority of the former display little artistic enterprise, preferring to lazily tread in well beaten tracks rather than to make excursions into more truly pleasure-giving paths. Too many are apparently led astray by the blighting royalty system, and some of our best artists sing ditties which excite a smile of compassion for both composer and executant. Not a few young artists have sacrificed their future by the perpetuation of inanities, and apparently many more will do the same. "High class" and "difficulty" would still seem in many minds to be synonymous terms, but this is not always so. There are hundreds of exquisite lyrics of the most simple but effective character lying neglected on publishers' shelves. What is really wanted is a crusade that shall reveal these hidden treasures to the public ear. Any vocalist who will take the trouble to dive into the catalogues of the prominent music publishers will be richly rewarded, for a good song reflects lustre on the singer, and produces the voice in the most advantageous manner.

The continued success of the weekly "dinner hour Concerts" at the City Temple Hall may be quoted as another proof, if more were needed, of the gratefulness of good music to the working masses. At the invitation of Mr. Hazell, M.P., to whom is due the establishment of these entertainments, Mr. Asquith paid them a visit on the 21st ult., and in a brief speech said that the idea, at first regarded as somewhat quixotic, had been fully justified by results, and that he thought that society owed its deepest debt of gratitude to any man who in these days could discover or invent a new method of bringing brightness and variety into the daily existence of those who earned their livelihood by the labour of their hands. His suggestion that the idea was perhaps capable of further development, and that the soothing effect of a musical hour might be tried in the Law Courts and House of Commons, opens a wide field for speculation. Music might well prove of service outside the hour. The memory of a witness might be refreshed by association with the performance of a certain tune; and a few trombones, with lusty players, would be most useful on certain occasions "in the House."

Our attention has been called by a correspondent to an edition by Dr. John Clarke of Purcell's Te Deum, published in 1868. We have been unable to procure a copy through ordinary channels, but at the British Museum we find that Dr. Clarke's adaptation with accompaniment for organ or pianoforte is, with a few exceptions, the same as that by Professor Bridge, being, vocally, a reproduction of the original score. Dr. Clarke's edition was published at nine shillings by the firm of Messrs. Lonsdale, whose plates and copyrights were sold in 1878. This fact, combined with the high price, may account for this version being unknown to musical critics and professional musicians. With regard to Dr. Boyce's arrangement not being in conformity with modern artistic ideas, allowance must be made for the different views which then prevailed, and which may have made Dr. Boyce's version necessary. If, too, Vincent Novello erred in afterwards publishing it, excuse is to be found in the rapidity of his publications and the enormous impetus his enterprise gave to music in this country.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

A jubilee performance of "Elijah," at the Crystal Palace, on Handel Festival scale, is announced to take place in June next. This is right and proper. A tendency to over-do jubilee and other chronological observances has been pointed out, but so few musical works keep their vitality undiminished and their freshness unfaded for half-a-century that not a word against the proposed commemoration of Mendelssohn's sacred masterpiece can reasonably be advanced. Let us all, when time comes, show that we are thankful for the great and precious gift which music received at Mendelssohn's hands in 1846.

Even in this advanced year of the world's age we occasionally meet with what, I suppose, must be called criticism, even though it suggest the style which Bendigo or Tom Sayers would have adopted had he chosen to work with pen instead of fists. But it is hard for the moderns to beat their predecessors at this exercise. I take a fine sample of journalistic amenity from the Theatrical Times of 1846. The remarks were provoked by a Bal Masqué given at Covent Garden Theatre under Jullien: "The last seal was set to the pretensions of that impudent imposter, Jullien, in the result of his beastly French exhibition on Monday last. How English*men* can tolerate the vile abominations of such an exhibition, we know not. What were the police about that half-naked unfortunates and wretched débauchés were allowed unrestrictedly to promenade the public thoroughfares, disgusting every eye and annoying every ear within reach of the intolerable nuisance? Let us hear no more of the talent of this Jullien. Any advertisement from this semi-naturalised barbarian shall receive fitting notice." The last sentence is rather suspicious, but there can be no doubt that the paragraph has a fine, full flavour.

Under the title of "National Portrait Gallery of British Musicians," edited by John Warriner, Mus. Doc., Trinity College, Dublin, Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston and Co. have in the press a work which will contain some hundreds of portraits of well known and eminent living musicians, who are either natives of Great Britain and Ireland or have permanently settled there, together with a short biographical notice of each.

Judge Meadows White has just tried a case in which certain persons who had placed a false name-plate upon a pianoforte urged that it was merely a "custom of the trade." In giving judgment his Honour said: "Defendants might reconcile it to their own consciences, but there could be no doubt that, by placing the wrong name of a maker upon an instrument the purchaser would be deceived. He did not think such practice came within the scope of fair and reasonable trading." That is true, but nothing can be more astonishing than the power which "custom of the trade" has over the conduct of even estimable men. We all remember that just person, John Bright, excusing adulteration on the ground that it was but a form of competition.

I read in The Morning:

At present music is used as a remedial agent in the treatment of lunacy by Dr. G. Alder Blumer, superintendent of the State hospital at Utica. He was led to make the experiment by the chance visit of two Italian organ-grinders. First they played in the exercising ground for disturbed women, and it was remarkable to witness the almost instantaneous effect of the simple music on the patients. The women became at once less boisterous, and were all evidently interested in and diverted by the music. From the yard the players entered some of the wards, and here again the salutary effect of music was apparent.

May it be argued from this that the persons who, to the wonder of their friends and the public, encourage organ-grinders are also "disturbed"?

A correspondent of a provincial journal lately unearthed a concert-notice forty years old, and had the satisfaction of seeing it reprinted. The plan of the article is that of a number of short paragraphs, each headed by the name of a piece performed and made up of remarkably vigorous and picturesque remarks thereupon. The reader may be interested in a few choice examples:

Trio from Vernon, "Sing unto the Lord and praise His name," by Fletcher, Jones, and Johnson, in a high key. Johnson's bass was beautiful; Fletcher's counter-tenor the same; violins tying well. While listening alternately to Fletcher and Johnson, we neglected Jones, and mean no disparagement to that gentleman; indeed, some say his was the finest voice and best managed of the three.

Trio from Handel's "Te Deum," "To Thee, cherubim and seraphim." Some young tenors performed most efficiently in this chorus, and neighbour Wallet distinguished himself by a most brilliant exhibition of his powers in alt.

Song, Vernon, "Thou shalt bring them in," by Briscoe, in a high counter-tenor, or, rather, what may not improperly be termed a demi-treble voice, not initially pleasing, but the song was well and musically sung, and he was very fine in his depths, especially where he trills upon "O Lord."

It is to be feared that the original genius which penned these inimitable notes died young.

Musical criticism by wire is always dangerous, and a collection of pranks played by the modern Puck would be vastly entertaining. I could myself contribute some choice specimens, of a kind to put even the Printer's Boy out of countenance. A recent case occurred in the experience of the Manchester Guardian, whose London correspondent was made to say that the Royal Choral Society admirably rendered "The Messiah" choruses, "especially 'Come unto me' and the 'Hallelujah.'" Fortunately, everybody knows what risks the senders of critical telegrams run.

The Windsor Chronicle, in noticing a Concert at Eton College, added, after mentioning a performance of a song and a three-part chorus, "There was an accompaniment of two hours and a half, and the effect was pleasing." This enigmatic sentence puzzled me greatly, but at length it began to dawn upon me that for "two hours and a half" should be read "two horns and a harp." If my solution be wrong, I give it up.

Mr. Cowen has completed his Suite de Ballet for the Philharmonic Society. It consists of six short movements, in which fairies, giants, gnomes, and witches, &c., are in turn musically presented, and it is probable that the whole will be called "In Fairyland." Mr. Cowen is at home in fairyland, and I look for some very pleasant and dainty effects in this work.

Mr. Cowen has been conducting the Hallé Concerts in Manchester and Liverpool for some while past. Is this the shadow before of a coming event? I trust so.

Mr. C. Lee Williams was well represented as a composer in the programme of the Bristol Madrigal Society's recent Concert (Ladies' Night), and the Western Daily Press came out with a just tribute to his ability: "Mr. Williams is a master of many styles, but he never appears to more signal advantage than when he sets a favourite lyric. In Tom Moore's 'When twilight dews are falling soft' he had a congenial theme, and the little Irish bard's love-lines were effectively wedded to music composed specially for the Bristol Madrigal Society, and first included by them in one of their schemes in 1885. There was no production that afforded more genuine gratification than this piece, which was accorded a bis."

Mr. Visetti has recently been in Rome, making arrangements for a demonstration of English music in the Eternal City. It is proposed to give two Concerts, at one of which the "Golden Legend" will be performed; Dr. Parry's "St. Cecilia" and some smaller selections will probably fill the second programme. The performers are all Italians, for whom the words have been translated by Mr. Mazzucato. According to present arrangements the Festival will take place early in April. Success to it. Apropos, Mr. Visetti, being half Italian and half English, is naturally entitled to place the music of the one country under the notice of the other.

The Gloucester Choral Society is unlucky just now. Last year its scheme of Concerts could not fully be carried out owing to the Shire Hall being under repair. It was believed, however, even by those who are familiar with the slowness of official minds and hands, that matters would be put straight in time for the present season. Alas for too sanguine hopes! The county architect and his men are still pottering about the building, and do not expect to clear out before May or June—which possibly means September or October. After having given its first Concert of the season in an inconvenient hall, with considerable loss, the Committee now announce that the second must be abandoned; the third, of course, remains doubtful.

Being thus free, the members of the Society have undertaken a performance of "The Messiah," in the Cathedral, on March 19, that being the 100th Recital of sacred music given there since Dean Butler and Mr. Lee Williams started those popular meetings in 1886.

The dates of the Richter Concerts for the present year have been settled. Only three performances will take place in the summer—May 18, June 1 and 8—owing to the demands of Bayreuth upon the conductor's time. The autumn season includes three London Concerts—October 19, 26, November 2—and ten provincial—October 17, 20 to 24, 27 to 31.

The new opera which Mr. MacCunn has undertaken to write, in conjunction with the Marquis of Lorne, is named after the legendary Celtic hero, Diarmid, and deals with the stirring, romantic events leading up to the death of that personage. It will be unusually spectacular. Mr. MacCunn will soon begin work upon yet another lyric drama, very different in character.

Mrs. Katharine Fisk has been engaged as principal contralto at the Norwich Festival. Miss Clara Butt, it is said, takes a year's rest.

The trustees of the new Music Hall at Cincinnati, having resolved to emblazon the names of four great composers over the proscenium arch, selected those of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Wagner. Dissatisfied, apparently, with the trustees' choice, an enterprising journal started a plébiscite among the professors of the city, mostly foreigners it would appear. Of the twenty-eight who voted all gave their voice for Beethoven, all but three for Wagner, and all but ten for Bach. Mozart had eleven votes and Mendelssohn only one. Well, the opinion of twenty-eight musicians who can only find eleven votes for Mozart and one for Mendelssohn is not worth much anyway. Cannot the American people settle such points for themselves instead of running for advice to Van der Stuckens, Bohlmans, Baurs, et hoc genus omne?

Mr. Apthorp, an American writer on music, is credited with saying: "Take, for instance, some of the attempts made in England at performing Handel's music just as he wrote it." What attempts? When did they take place, and where? I know of such doings in Germany, and very successful they are; I know also that, in England, we have gone back to some of the old instruments for which Bach wrote, but the experiments with Handel I have forgotten, if I ever heard of them.

A writer in the Musical Courier declares that, the Schomburgh line notwithstanding, "New York still takes its annual dose of British music in the shape of 'The Messiah' with avidity." Thanks for the compliment to British music. I now expect to find the name of the composer printed as Handel, not Händel.

Mr. Emile Sauret claims that his repertory consists of 438 compositions.

Winkler's Musical Miscellany (Kingston, Jamaica) stated, not long since, that the lighthouse at Morant Bay, in the extreme East of the island, was erected by Sir George Grove, then Mr. George Grove, C.E. This was corrected by the Jamaica Post, which paper declared that it was the Plumb Point lighthouse. Later, "A Young Musician" wrote to say that he had made enquiry into the facts "and discovered an iron plate at the base of the last-mentioned lighthouse (Morant Bay) which bears Sir George Grove's name and testifies to his having superintended the works." Sir George's name has since been written on more abiding material than iron.

Madame Antoinette Sterling is said to have told an interviewer that her coming to America was "a psychic necessity," and had to be obeyed though "thousands of pounds in English engagements" were sacrificed.

A DISCUSSION ON THE VERSES

"PIANO-FORTE"

(Printed in The Musical Times for January, 1896).

Dear Sir, you've reason when you say:
"In Music, sure, the letter P
Should tell performers they must play
As softly, lightly, as may be."

But, by experience, I have found
The letter P., by Greekish spelling,
Can indicate the Forte sound,
Ph. as F. will "loud" be telling.

From what I hear, it seems to me
Performers on this spelling act;
It's no use authors marking P.,
Phorte is played—and that's a fact.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Doubts have sometimes been cast upon Handel's "Messiah" as a work that will continue to hold its own notwithstanding modern musical developments. The aspect of the Albert Hall on New Year's Day afforded no ground for such a supposition, for, in spite of the fact that it was a non-subscription night, the vast building was well filled in every part, the audience being one of the largest that has ever been gathered on the first day of the year. Sir Joseph Barnby's choir was in excellent form, and of course a considerable measure of justice was done to the solos, in the abbreviated version of the most sacred of all choral works, by Madame Albani, Mrs. Katharine Fisk, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Santley.

On Thursday, the 16th ult., "Israel in Egypt" was given, and attracted, as usual, a large audience. The splendid and well-trained choristers delivered the colossal numbers allotted to them in this most massive of all oratorios with marvellous precision, and the comparatively unimportant solos were efficiently rendered by Madame Medora Henson, Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Clara Butt, and Mr. Lloyd Chandos. The famous duet, "The Lord is a Man of war," was sung, as usual, by the 400 tenors and basses of the choir; and although this procedure is, of course, not in accordance with Handel's intentions, the result is unquestionably very effective.

QUEEN'S HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The promise of high attainment which was held out by Mr. Randegger's choir at the Queen's Hall, at the beginning of this season, may be said to have been realised on the 22nd ult., when the Society gave its third Concert, the programme of which consisted of the "Spring" section from Haydn's "Seasons," Saint-Saëns's setting of the 19th Psalm, "The Heavens declare" (Op. 42), and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." To lovers of novelties interest was chiefly centred in the French composer's work, which, in common with many other earnest endeavours, has suffered undeserved neglect since its production in England by the Sacred Harmonic Society on November 20, 1885, and its subsequent performance at St. James's Hall by the Novello Choir in 1889. The fine contrapuntal opening and closing choruses were most effectively sung by the Queen's Hall Choir, and the imposing unison chorus, "And rejoiceth as a giant," advantageously manifested the fine quality of the choristers' voices. Madame Clara Samuell sang the beautiful solo, "Thou, O Lord, art my Protector," the gem of the work, with the utmost devotional fervour; Miss Regina de Sales interpreted the soprano solo parts with much artistic success, and good service was rendered in the elaborate Sextet by Miss Dews. The other soloists were Messrs. Ben Davies, Ffrangcon-Davies, Herbert Thorndike, Winfred Goff, and W. A. Peterkin, all of whom discharged their several duties in admirable fashion. The performances of Haydn's and Mendelssohn's works further displayed the excellences of Mr. Randegger's choir, which is now entitled to rank amongst the first in the metropolis.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Henschel resumed his exposition of the progress of Beethoven's genius on the 23rd ult., the inclusion in the programme of the C minor Symphony being probably responsible for the exceptionally large audience which thronged to St. James's Hall on the occasion. The Concert opened with a fine performance of the "Fidelio" Overture, the poetic basis of which work was "explained" in the programme (by an anonymous author) in a way that suggested Puff's interpretation of Lord Burleigh's famous nod. Following the Overture came Leonora's beautiful scena and aria "Abscheulicher," which was rendered with great taste and feeling by Madame Duma. Messrs. L. Borwick, Arbos, and Paul Ludwig gave an excellent performance of the seldom-played Concerto for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Op. 56); but fresh hearing of the work failed to convince us that its neglect is unjustifiable. Though naturally full of points that would establish the reputation of a smaller composer, the Concerto is, for Beethoven, singularly wanting in that peculiar quality that, for want of a more scientifically accurate term, is known as "inspiration." A powerful, impressive, and highly sympathetic rendering of the magnificent C minor Symphony ended the Concert, which included also the exquisitely beautiful "Good Friday's Spell" from "Parsifal," very delicately played and much enjoyed. Altogether the Concert was one of those at which Mr. Henschel's attainments as a conductor have shone to greatest advantage.

ROYAL CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.

On the 20th ult., at Daly's Theatre, the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company began a four weeks' season—its first in London since 1890. As at present arranged the series is to consist of Matinée performances only, the theatre being otherwise occupied in the evenings. Daly's Theatre is by no means large enough for "Grand opera"—as Londoners understand the term; but Covent Garden being out of the question, and no other suitable house proving available, it had to serve, the sacrifice of the first row of stalls to the gentlemen of the orchestra being, perhaps, the most conspicuous sign of cramped conditions. Time was when an English opera season would have been inaugurated with the "Bohemian Girl," as a matter of course. On this occasion the honour fell to "Tannhäuser," an indication alike of the change in public taste and of managerial wisdom. Ten minutes before the hour of commencement it was impossible to buy a seat. With regard to the performance it merits high praise, judged even by London standards. In the important matter of ensemble it was superior to many of greater pretension that we have in memory, and, as regards the principal characters, went far towards satisfying quite fastidious tastes. Miss Ella Russell, the Elizabeth, has greatly improved as an actress since London amateurs have had an opportunity of appreciating her talents in opera, and her interpretation of the beautiful character was full of intelligence and sympathy. Her costume in the second act was, however, not well chosen. The Tannhäuser was Mr. Hedmondt, whose performance of this difficult part was one of the best features of his recent Covent Garden season, and who was heard and seen to still greater advantage in the smaller house. Wolfram was in the safe hands of Mr. Ludwig, and the Landgrave found a most capable exponent in Mr. L. Pringle. Miss Erna Gelber was a satisfactory Venus, and the remaining parts were filled by Miss Minnie Hunt (the Shepherd) and Messrs. F. Wood, D. O'Sullivan, P. Somers, and C. Tilbury. Mr. Richard Eckhold, who conducted (for the first time in London, we believe), is evidently an able artist—he never for a moment allowed the orchestra to overpower the voices, and realised the effects of Wagner's score with perfect success.

On the 21st ult. "Carmen" was presented, with Miss Zelie de Lussan and Mr. Barton McGuckin as the Gipsy and Don José, parts which they have often played before London opera-goers, though never with more success than on this occasion. Miss Hunt made a sympathetic Micaela, and sang with much charm, and the Toreador was efficiently represented by Mr. W. Paull. Chorus and orchestra were again excellent, and the conductor, Mr. Claude Jacquinot, discharged his duties with ease and skill.

On the 22nd ult. took place the first performance in London of "Jeanie Deans," the opera by Messrs. Joseph Bennett and Hamish MacCunn, which as readers of The Musical Times will remember was produced at Edinburgh in November, 1894. The leading features of the libretto and music of this work were dealt with so fully in our December issue for that year that no necessity exists for detailed notice of them here, especially as, with two exceptions (Madge Wildfire and Janet Balcristie), the original cast was adhered to, and the composer himself conducted. The performance was excellent, and the opera was cordially received, the greatest effect being made by the first scene of Act iv. Here the music rises to its greatest height, and here, too, Madame Duma (the Jeanie) was heard at her best. Mr. MacCunn has so evidently striven throughout this, his first opera, to write music that shall be dramatic instead of merely tuneful—that shall express the feelings of the characters rather than attract attention for its own sake, that his high aim deserves to be fully acknowledged and encouraged. The two chief faults of the music of "Jeanie Deans," in our opinion, are its lack of characteristic and significant themes, and the number of vocal passages that do not arise naturally out of the elocutionary inflections of the words—indeed, are often in contradiction to them. The scenery and staging of the opera deserve a special word of praise.

But few remarks are necessary concerning the performances of "Lohengrin" and Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon," which were respectively mounted on the 23rd and 24th ult. Mr. Barton McGuckin's impersonation of Lohengrin is too well-known to call for comment, and although Miss Ella Russell can scarcely be said to realise the girlish simplicity of the heroine, the part was rendered vocally in a most effective manner. Miss Clara Poole and Mr. Ludwig were respectively excellent exponents of the characters of Ortrud and Telramund, and the other parts were adequately interpreted. The title rôle of "Mignon" was sustained by Mdlle. Zelie de Lussan with the usual success which attends her assumption of this character; Miss Eva Relda appeared as Filina, and Mr. Robert Cunningham sang with noticeable taste and refinement the graceful music assigned to Wilheim. Excellent service was also rendered by Mr. Alec Marsh and Mr. F. A. Wood, who severally impersonated Lothario and Laertes. As at the previous performances the ensemble was excellent.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

On Saturday afternoon, the 4th ult., these performances were resumed with an attractive programme, commencing with Mozart's delightful Quartet in D minor, known as No. 2, though it is really the eighteenth in the order of composition. Another universally admired classic was Beethoven's Sonata in A for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 69), powerfully played by Messrs. Reisenauer and Piatti. The pianist concluded the performance with Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques, which he played more acceptably than on a previous occasion. Mr. Kennerley Rumford was acceptable in two piquant and quaint songs, "How do I love thee" and "Crabbed age and youth."

A powerful scheme was presented on the following Monday, including Schubert's glorious Quintet in C (Op. 163), and, for the first time, Tschaïkowsky's Pianoforte Trio in A minor (Op. 50), dedicated "to the memory of a great artist." The great artist in question was Nicolas Rubinstein, a brother of the more eminent Anton Rubinstein, and the work, therefore, is in the main elegiac in character. In fact, the first movement is marked Pezzo elegiaco; but more remarkable is the second, a Tema con variazioni in E, most ingeniously and effectively constructed. The third and last section commences in spirited fashion, but the close is as mournful as that of Tschaïkowsky's "Symphonie Pathétique," so that the two works have something in common. The Trio was fairly well interpreted by Lady Hallé and Messrs. Reisenauer and Piatti, but the pianist did not keep himself under sufficient control. Mr. Watkin Mills was in the highest degree artistic in songs by Purcell, Handel, and Schumann.

A splendid performance of Schumann's Fantasia in C (Op. 17), by Mr. Leonard Borwick, was the most noteworthy feature of the Concert on Saturday, the 11th ult.; a finer or more thoroughly Schumannesque interpretation of this most characteristic work could not be desired. Mr. Piatti gave his clever arrangement for violoncello of Locatelli's Violin Sonata in D in his own inimitable manner, and the concerted works were Mozart's Pianoforte Trio in E (No. 6) and Mendelssohn's early Quartet in A minor (Op. 13). Mr. Richard Green gained applause in vocal pieces by Handel and Jensen.

Cherubini's first and most generally admired Quartet in E flat headed the scheme of Monday, the 13th ult., and was played with all possible refinement under the leadership of Lady Hallé, the only other concerted work being Mendelssohn's Pianoforte and Violoncello Sonata in D (Op. 58). Mr. Leonard Borwick gave an intelligent if not striking rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 81), "Les Adieux," &c., and Miss Boye was agreeable in songs by Bach and Wagner.

On Saturday, the 18th ult., the programme began with Dvorák's very fine and impressive Quartet in E flat (Op. 51), one of the Bohemian master's most characteristic works. Mr. Leonard Borwick was scarcely at his best in two pieces by Chopin, but the rendering of Schubert's Rondeau Brillant in B minor (Op. 70), in conjunction with Lady Hallé, was all that could be desired. Two little violoncello pieces by Mr. Piatti, entitled "The Entreaty" and "The Race," the latter a perpetuum mobile, were, of course, faultlessly played; and Mr. William Nicholl sang agreeably, save that his enunciation of the words might have been more distinct.

The last Concert we can notice for the present is that of Monday, the 20th ult., at which was presented for the first time a new Sonata in A minor, by Signor Piatti. This is ostensibly for violoncello and pianoforte, but the former instrument is allotted prominence from first to last. Though noteworthy for Italian grace and refinement, the new Sonata is distinguished by more vigour and energy than we are accustomed to associate with Mr. Piatti's compositions, and it made an unquestionably favourable impression. The pianist was Miss Fanny Davies, who gave in her best Schumannesque manner a selection from the "Davidsbündler." Brahms's concise and genial Quintet in G (Op. 111) and Haydn's Pianoforte Trio in C completed the instrumental portion of the programme, and Mr. Kennerley Rumford showed artistic feeling in his rendering of songs by Brahms and Tschaïkowsky.

MR. DAVID BISPHAM'S CONCERT.

If Mr. David Bispham's second Concert, which took place on the 7th ult., at St. James's Hall, appealed with less force than the first to antiquarian musicians, it was equally attractive to lovers of music. Those who take pleasure in that which is new were regaled with a Quintet of novel character, one of the parts being written for a bass voice. This work, composed by Mr. Walford Davies, once a scholar, now a teacher at the Royal College of Music, is a setting of some lines by Browning entitled "Prospice." It opens with a Largo espressivo for a quartet of strings, and it is only when these have developed at some length a graceful theme of meditative character and a climax has been attained that the voice-part enters. The spirit of the words is from thence carefully reflected and suggested by the strings, which entwine in "wondrous harmony" until the final lines are reached. Here, however, the composer seems to have been led away by the desire to secure a resemblance to the opening bars instead of seeking to express the exaltation contained in the final words of the text. An excellent quartet was provided by Mr. Gompertz's party, and Mr. Bispham gave an impressive delivery of the vocal portion. As a whole, however, the work, while exciting the respect of the musician, somewhat lacks spontaneity. Doubtless many memories were awakened by the concert-giver's singing of Bishop's "Pilgrim of Love," Dibdin's "Sailor's Journal," Shield's "Quaff with me the purple wine," and other fine old songs redolent with healthy and manly sentiment, concerning which, in common with other selections of the afternoon, instructive, historical, and other information was supplied by Mr. Edgar F. Jacques in a programme embellished with a quaint coloured illustration of Rowlandson's as the title-page. Some songs of to-day were expressively interpreted by Miss Esther Palliser, the Meister Glee Singers were heard in glees worthy of their skill, which cannot always be said of this highly-trained quartet party, and Mr. Leonard Borwick and Mr. Gompertz respectively played pianoforte and violin solos with charm and pleasure-giving finish. The admirable Concert was concluded in a spirited fashion by Mr. Bispham declaiming three of Professor Villiers Stanford's "Cavalier" Songs, the choruses of which were sung by students of the Royal College with a sympathy for rebellion that in the days to which the ditties referred would inevitably have led to a change of domicile on the part of the singers.

PEOPLE'S PALACE.

On Saturday, the 18th ult., Sir A. C. Mackenzie's "Dream of Jubal" was given at the People's Palace, Mile End, before a large, attentive, and most appreciative audience. Mr. Joseph Bennett's beautiful poem was recited by Mr. Charles Fry, who, stimulated, no doubt, by the occasion, gave more than usual effect to the fine declamatory passages which fell to his share. The salvos of applause, which at the East-End have a ring about them that is good to hear, showed how heartily the popular reciter's efforts were appreciated. The soloists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Ella Sayer, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. F. Hosking. Mrs. Hutchinson made a great impression in "The Lord is good," Mr. Iver McKay was compelled to repeat a verse of "The Song of the Sickle," and a similar compliment was paid to the love-duet. The chorus and orchestra grappled manfully with the difficulties of the work (which are not small) and gave a very fair idea of the effects intended by the composer, though it cannot be said they always realised them. Mr. C. H. Allen Gill conducted with immense spirit and watchful care, and deserves great credit for the result achieved. That the huge audience found the music to their taste was evident after the opening piece, the "Gloria," the last chord of which merged into a burst of applause that somewhat tried the nerves of an effete West-Ender. "The Dream of Jubal" was preceded by Mr. German's fine Overture to "Richard III."

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS' ELEVENTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

As far as the number of members (over 400) and interest and importance of the various functions, the eleventh annual Conference, held in Edinburgh on December 31 till the 3rd ult., established a record. One of the most interesting ceremonies in the course of—although not actually connected with—the Conference was the "Laureation" of Sir Alexander Mackenzie as Mus. Doc. honoris causâ of the University of Edinburgh. The Right Honourable the Lord Provost of the City opened the first meeting with a warm welcome on behalf of the Corporation. The University put the spacious music class-room at the disposal of the committee for meetings, &c. The Edinburgh section guaranteed among themselves a sum of more than £100 in order that the Concert of Sir A. Mackenzie's music should be arranged in a manner worthy of the occasion.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who presided over the first meeting, read a most interesting paper on "Musical Life in Edinburgh sixty years since." He said that in our own time—indeed, during the last twenty years—music and its practice had passed through several phases and unlooked-for developments, not the least noteworthy of which was the remarkable effect made by the compositions having for their all-pervading flavour characteristics pertaining to the primitive music of the various nationalities. He then proceeded to sketch the history of the development of music in Scotland, and particularly its rise in Edinburgh since the institution in that city of the Society of Professional Musicians in 1819. The facilities for musical education had been multiplied to such an extent as to become even a little alarming to those who gave serious consideration to the over-cheapening process to which the professional work of teachers was being subjected, leading them to the conclusion that education might be brought within too easy reach of the many and become perhaps a somewhat doubtful benefit. If they were to judge by the amount of music which was written and published during a year in England, the question, "Are we a musical nation?" would never have been so frequently put, if at all. What concerned them was not the quantity, but the quality. To be frank, vocal music had become a more powerful conductor in the easy descent to Avernus than instrumental. A considerable experience on so-called "entry days" at a musical institution with which he had more than a mere nodding acquaintance, led him to bring before their notice the fact that there must still be something "rotten in the State of Denmark" as regarded the election of the musical food upon which some of our young musicians, more especially our young vocalists, were nourished. He said young vocalists, because his strictures applied with much less force to instrumentalists, who seemed to be much more dainty and careful in the selection of their music for study. He suggested the holding of a conference of singing teachers to discuss the questions—(1) What sort of music are we compelled to teach? (2) What sort of music do we individually feel inclined to teach? The first question might be answered in good old Scottish fashion by asking another—Does anyone compel us to teach rubbish at all? The second question required silent meditation. These were very serious questions, and to a great extent affected the so-called newer school of native instrumental music as well. An earnest and conscientious one it might be; all the same, there was an insidious disease creeping stealthily into it. It was called "rickets" in the human child, and that was as good a name as any other to use in this connection. They had seen quite enough of misshapen forms and neurotic, sapless work. He trusted that in the future more power would be exerted in favour of a less sickly and more breezy music, a music more in harmony with our own national characteristics.

Professor Niecks read a paper which dealt with the "Association of Tonal and Verbal Speech." He said they might differ as to the extent of the expressiveness of music, but none of them was likely to deny it altogether, unless he were blind to the development of the art during the last three hundred years—a development mainly of its expressiveness—and deaf to the appeals that were made to him with ever-increasing forcibleness by every succeeding generation of composers. If music, he proceeded to say, could heighten the expressiveness of words it must have some expressiveness of its own. No musician doubted in these days its expressiveness, but many doubted the definiteness of its expression. A thorough examination of the question, however, showed that music, like poetry, painting, and other arts, was definite in some and indefinite in other respects. After parenthetically remarking that there was nothing more helpless than the musician whose whole equipment consisted in his technical acquirements, he dealt particularly with vocal music, saying that the capacities of verbal and tonal speech were not alike. It was, of course, possible to set absolutely good music to unmusical words, and, indeed, some composers had boasted that they could set a bill of fare to music, but where the composer did so there was a want of harmony between the words and the music. There was nothing more common than composers setting to music words as uninteresting as bills of fare, and that was sometimes done out of pure carelessness. The itch of composing was so strong in some that they had not patience to consider the words. The want of foresight and insight on the part of composers was next referred to by Professor Niecks, and the various ways in which music might be set to suitable words considered, special attention being paid to the epic, lyric, dramatic, and descriptive elements in ballads and operas. The song, he said, in conclusion, was the only entirely rational form of vocal composition. All others were at best compromises between reason and unreason, between the possible and the impossible; whereas the full power and beauty of music were only possible in instrumental music.

Professor Prout addressed the members on "The Orchestra in 1800 and 1900." In general terms it might be said, he thought, that the difference between the orchestration of the last century and that of the present day was that in the latter the instruments were treated more in large groups and masses and proportionately less as solo instruments than was the case with the older composers. The additions made to the resources of the orchestra in the last 100 years had consisted far less in the introduction of new instruments than in new methods of treating and combining those already in use. The tendency had been specially in the direction of increased richness and fulness. Was this an unmixed advantage? He ventured to deny that it was. He feared the younger generation of musicians were fed so largely on the highly seasoned diet provided by modern composers that they had little or no taste for the simpler fare offered by the old masters. Let them, by all means, welcome everything new which was good, but let them not, at the same time, reject what was good simply because it was old. To the student who was beginning to score for the orchestra he would say—"By all means make yourself acquainted with modern scores, but take for your models rather those masters who, like Mozart, Beethoven. Schubert, or Mendelssohn, were content with moderate resources. Do not waste your colours, but try how much effect you can obtain from a few instruments at a time."

Other papers and addresses were delivered by Mr. W. H. Cummings (in place of Mr. Walter Hately), who spoke on "Music and Musical Instruments in Scotland before the eighteenth century"; Mr. A. K. Virgil, on "Technical Pianoforte Instruction"; Mr. Franklin Peterson, on the absurdity of the usual "elementary" instruction of "Theory" (a full report of this paper, "The Bitter Cry of the Children," will be found in the School Music Review for February); Mr. T. Roylands-Smith, on "Choral Associations"; and Mr. S. Midgley, on "The Influence of the five-octave keyboard on Beethoven's Pianoforte Works." Organ Recitals were given in St. Mary's Cathedral by Mr. T. H. Collinson and by Mr. T. Hartley in St. Giles's Cathedral.

There was no want of more "social" functions. A Concert was given in the Waterloo Rooms, on December 31, by the Glasgow Select Choir (conductor, Mr. J. Millar Craig), followed by vocal and instrumental compositions composed and performed by the members of the Edinburgh section. On the 1st ult. a Banquet, presided over by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, was held in the Royal Hotel, and attracted a good hundred more than the room could hold with any regard to comfort or health.

The Edinburgh Society of Musicians threw open its rooms on the afternoon of the 2nd ult., and entertained the Conference to afternoon tea. The Lodge "Dramatic and Arts" and the Scottish Arts Club likewise extended their hospitality to the visitors, and the Conference was brought to a brilliant conclusion on the evening of the 3rd ult., when the Right Hon. the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the City gave a Reception and Ball in the Music Hall and Assembly Rooms.

An excellent programme of music by Mr. Moonie's Male-Voice Choir ("To the Sons of Art" and Scandinavian part-songs), Miss Margaret Hoare (vocal solos), and Mr. Paul Della Torre (pianoforte solos) varied the proceedings at the Reception.

The choral-orchestral Concert, on the evening of Thursday, the 2nd ult., was the event in the Conference of most interest to the general public. The programme had been arranged from the works of Sir A. C. Mackenzie, and the Choral Union, as well as its able conductor, Mr. Collinson, very kindly put their services at the disposal of the Committee. The Scottish Orchestra was engaged, and Sir A. C. Mackenzie himself wielded the bâton. The chorus sang the "Cottar's Saturday Night" with very evident appreciation, and responded very carefully to all the demands made upon them by the composer. Mr. John Dunn was warmly recalled for an excellent performance of the "Pibroch," and the three pieces "From the North," the most successful number on the programme, so delighted the audience that No. 2 had to be repeated. Sir A. C. Mackenzie was received with the greatest enthusiasm at the opening of the Concert, and frequently during the performance, as well as after the closing number (a sparkling rendering of his clever "Britannia" Overture), the applause was loud and long.

CONVENTION OF TONIC SOL-FA MUSICIANS.

A Convention of musicians and students who advocate the use of the Tonic Sol-fa method was held in Aldersgate Street on the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th ult. On the first day Mr. J. S. Curwen presided, and in his opening address observed that the spread of the Tonic Sol-fa movement went on as fast as ever. It was now to be found amongst all classes, and some of the younger members of the Royal Family were taking it up. The choir of Welsh miners, which had recently performed before the Queen at Windsor, was composed almost entirely of Tonic Sol-faists, and when the Kaffir chiefs came from Bechuanaland recently, it was found that they were all thoroughly acquainted with the system, and could sing at sight from it. A paper on solo singing was read and admirably illustrated by Mr. W. J. Kidner, of Bristol; Mr. L. C. Venables gave a Lecture on sight-singing, in which he made some suggestions as to how difficult passages should be translated into Tonic Sol-fa notation, and Mr. S. Filmer Rook gave a lesson on voice training for adult classes.

On the morning of the second day many of the delegates and visitors from the country, to the number of sixty, were taken round in brakes to some of the "musical haunts" of London, under the congenial care of Mr. F. G. Edwards. St. Peter's Church, Cornhill, where the old keyboard upon which Mendelssohn played the organ is still preserved; the premises of Messrs. Broadwood, the room in which Weber died, and the rooms of the Royal Society of Musicians were visited. At the afternoon meeting of the Convention, Mr. McNaught read a paper on problems of sight-singing, and opened discussions upon various proposals for modifying and improving the Tonic Sol-fa notation. At the evening meeting, Mr. J. S. Curwen gave a model first lesson on chords to children, Mr. McNaught following with a paper on "Notes on Children's Voices" and another model lesson, and Mr. R. D. Jamieson, of Glasgow, concluding with an admirable paper on "The leader of Church Praise and the materials."

On the third day a ladies' meeting was held at which the Virgil Clavier was explained by Mrs. Curwen, and Miss M. L. Wood read an interesting paper on "The past and present position of music in the Isle of Man." At the open meeting in the evening, Mr. M. O. Jones, of Treherbert, Glamorgan, read a paper, entitled "A Retrospect of the Progress of the Tonic Sol-fa System in Wales," and Dr. H. Coward, of Sheffield, lectured upon "The Madrigal, Glee, and Part-Song," illustrations of which were well sung by the South London Temperance Choir under Mr. Seemer Betts. The Convention was well attended. There were present visitors from most of the large towns in Great Britain. At the concluding meeting there was an interesting reception of the surviving members, or as many as could be gathered, of the choir that gained a prize at the Paris Exhibition in 1867, under the late Mr. Joseph Proudman.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Mr. D. J. Blaikley read an important paper on "Standards of Musical Pitch" on the 15th ult., at the Royal Academy of Music. In briefly tracing the history of the subject, the lecturer went back to the French commission of 1859, which resulted in the adoption by France of the Diapason Normal with A of 435 vibrations, and which was a compromise between the highest pitch then in use and the pitch of the time of Mozart. The Society of Arts took up the subject immediately after the French commission had made its report, but was unable to do more than direct public attention to the matter. The next steps of importance were the publication in 1880, in the journal of the Society, of the exhaustive lectures given by Mr. Ellis, and the public meeting on June 20, 1885, at St. James's Hall, convened by the Directors of the Royal Academy of Music. The latter led to the appointment of a committee, under the chairmanship of Sir George Macfarren; but it dissolved itself on the declaration of the Duke of Cambridge that it was impossible to alter the pitch of the military bands. At the Military Exhibition at Chelsea, in 1890, the lecturer had proposed a compromise pitch of A 449, which offered many advantages. Finally, the adoption of the Diapason Normal by the Philharmonic Society last year had revived the question, which it was most desirable should now be finally settled. Not the least interesting portions of Mr. Blaikley's paper were the explanations given of some of the causes which had conduced to the rise in pitch since the time of Handel, when A was nearly three-quarters of a tone flatter than the highest in present use. Personally there would seem to be a constant craving on the part of orchestral players to be a trifle sharper than their neighbours, and instrument makers were frequently called upon to sharpen instruments. The well known brass bands in manufacturing districts had a liking for being above the recognised army pitch. The effect of heat was to raise the pitch of all wind instruments, which responded comparatively in the following order of sensitiveness: wood-wind, small brass, large brass, and organ pipes, the last-named being the most susceptible. A tuning-fork, however, was flattened by being heated, and thus might agree with a standard directly after being filed down to it, but would be sharper on cooling. Koenig now tuned his forks at a temperature of 20° Cent. or 68° Fahr. as being more in accordance with the average heat of concert-rooms. As an example of the effect of heat on orchestral wind instruments a bugle and clarinet were placed in hot water, and two like instruments of the same pitch were immersed in iced water, with the result of a mutual alteration in their respective pitches of nearly a semitone. In short, every accident, every error, and every personal eccentricity seemed to exert an influence calculated to raise the pitch. No better primary standard of pitch existed than a large tuning-fork. Such an instrument, carefully preserved in the Museum of the Paris Conservatoire, formed the standard of the Diapason Normal. If a similar basis were adopted in England it was necessary that not only the temperature of the fork at which it was to give a certain number of vibrations should be stated, but also the temperature in which the various instruments were to agree with it, as they could not be in accord at all temperatures. The requirement of a more scientific definition of pitch was the more necessary since all such wind instruments as flutes and clarinets were at their best as regards intonation at one particular length; but their tuning and length must be determined by the temperature at which they were required to be at a given pitch. It was possible to alter brass instruments from the high pitch to the Diapason Normal, but with the wood-wind accurate conversion was hopeless, as the relative distance of the sound-holes in these instruments was decided by the length of the tube. All instruments could, however, be converted to the suggested pitch of A 449. No English pitch could be truly called national unless it was that adopted by the army bands, since provincial orchestras were largely dependent on these players. That some decision from the military authorities was called for was patent from the fact that the rule at Kneller Hall stated that "In order to ensure uniformity throughout the regimental bands of the service the instruments are to be of the same pitch as that adopted by the Philharmonic Society." As far as wind instrument makers were concerned, it was absolutely immaterial to them whether the existing army pitch should be the only standard or whether the Diapason Normal should exist side by side with it; under no circumstances could the elimination of instruments made to the former pitch take place rapidly. The point of extreme importance on their side of the question was that there should be no hesitation or uncertainty about the matter, and that whatever was done should be done with as near an approach to official authority as the nature of the case allowed. This end could probably be arrived at if the Philharmonic Society would take the lead and secure a definition from the military authorities of their standard of pitch of a more scientific character than at present existed; the agreement of the chief musical academies and institutions to take joint action with the Philharmonic Society; and the establishing in the metropolis and in local centres of large tuning-forks or other standards of pitch approved and certified by a board or committee of experts.

The Competition for the Macfarren Scholarship took place on the 8th ult. The scholarship was awarded to Percy Hilder Miles (a native of Erith), and the examiners highly commended Joseph Charles Holbrook.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

At the first Concert of the new term, given on the 22nd ult., Miss Marie Motto introduced two recently published violin pieces by Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor. They were a "Lament" and a dance-measure in 2-4 time, entitled "Merrymaking." Like the rest of this talented young composer's recent works, these two numbers, forming his Op. 9, display the rare gift of originality in a marked degree. The "Lament" especially, an inexpressibly sad, not to say lugubrious Larghetto, in the composer's favourite 6-4 time, with a somewhat brighter and very beautiful middle portion, is absolutely new and unlike anything of the kind we know. The absence of any decided rhythm, the strangely syncopated and altogether unconventional character of the complicated pianoforte accompaniment, and the peculiar intervals which abound in the melody of the violin, produce something like bewilderment on a first hearing. Needless to say, the beauties of such music do not lie on the surface, nor are they revealed by a correct but somewhat unemotional performance, such as Miss Motto gave. The dance is a boisterous, strongly-accentuated, tuneful Vivace of irresistible, breezy freshness. Unfortunately it was taken at such a rapid pace that the performance, and more especially the pianoforte accompaniment, played by the composer, almost resembled a "scramble." Miss Otie Chew and Miss Gertrude King played Brahms's beautiful G major Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in a manner which seemed here and there to betray want of proper preparation, and Messrs. William Ackroyd, Samuel Grimson, Charles Jacoby, and Miss Ethel Uhlhorn-Zillhardt gave an impressive performance of Smetana's E minor String Quartet ("Aus meinem Leben"). Mr. Howard Jones played Chopin's Fantaisie in F minor (Op. 49) with fluent technique but little appreciation of its poetical import, and Miss Ena Bedford and Mr. Emlyn Davies displayed their fine voices in Goring Thomas's duet "Amours Villageoises."

ROYAL INSTITUTION.

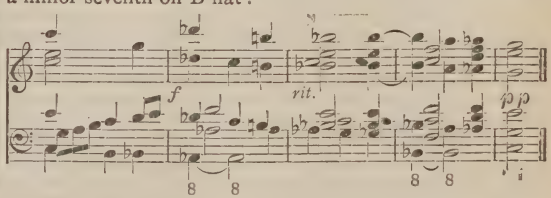
"Sound, hearing, and speech" formed an attractive subject for the recent series of "Christmas Lectures" annually given at the Royal Institution, and Professor John Gray McKendrick, to whom the discourses were this year intrusted, acquitted himself of his task in a manner that not only appealed effectively to the young folks, but also awakened and sustained the interest of children of larger growth, who, it may be added, formed the majority of the audience. Whenever the scientist treats of sound the musician may listen with advantage to himself and his craft, and although the composer may write a good symphony without intimate acquaintance with the complexity of sound waves, yet the manner in which some waves nullified each other under certain conditions is suggestive that the old adage of knowledge being power might once again prove true. Of course, the phonograph was an important witness to the truth of the Professor's remarks, and, like some mystic genie, it faithfully spoke, sang, and played as commanded with the perfection of obedience. Its sensitiveness was, however, shown to be far below that of the human ear, and in the description given of the aural apparatus much food was again given for thought to the earnest musician. The compass of the ear, the Professor said, extended over eleven octaves, and it was able to distinguish variations in pitch of the sixty-fourth part of a semitone. This was apparently accomplished by a marvellous arrangement of microscopical hair-like fibres, some 24,000 in number, each of which, in tiny cells filled with liquid, vibrated in sympathy with a particular portion of the entire range of sounds audible to us. By these means the most complex vibrations were analysed and decomposed, each hair-like fibre picking out the wave with which it was in sympathy and reporting its presence to the brain. All normal human ears had this apparatus, and thus the difference between the cultured musician and the uncultured was mental. So to speak, the nerves faithfully piped, but the brains of the majority were too dull or careless to hear. By some ingenious experiments the Professor showed how marvellously quick and discriminating the ear was in detecting variations of pitch and timbre. Thus the accentuation of any harmonic of a note was not only immediately discerned, but also its effect on the timbre of the note. The slightest flatness or sharpness of any of the harmonics was, too, instantly made known by the consequent pulsations set up. All this and more of the same nature gave significance to the remark that in the future music would mean much more to man than it did at present; and, indeed, it would seem plain that, could our brains be trained to appreciate all that our ears accomplished, music would far excel speech as a means of expression and communication of thought.

The wonders of vocal production were also explained, and in a manner calculated to be of practical help to singers. The descriptions of the extreme delicacy of the vocal membranes—a term happily substituted for vocal cords—was a forcible warning against over-straining the voice, and what to many is the mystery of the vocal registers was shown to be merely the involuntary re-arrangements of certain internal portions of the vocal apparatus in the throat as the scale was ascended or vice versâ. Timbre was proved to result from the formation of the resonant chambers at the back of the nose and the position assumed by the mouth. The amplitude of the sound produced depended on the depth from the edge of the vocal membranes which vibrated. Some experiments with vowel sounds threw doubt upon Helmholtz's theory that each possessed its own peculiar pitch, but otherwise recent researches and discoveries confirmed the great acoustician's deductions. In conclusion the Professor pleaded for his audience's continued sympathy with science, since it meant "knowing the truth about the wonderful phenomena of the world in which we live."

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

A paper of great value to students of harmony and of universal interest to all earnest lovers of music was read by Dr. Sawyer, on the 13th ult., at the Musical Association. The lecturer took for his subject "The tendencies of modern harmony, as exemplified in the works of Dvorák and Grieg," and although, owing to their complexity, the importance of his researches will probably not be fully appreciated until the discourse appears in the annual Proceedings of the Society, the direction in which harmony has developed and was still tending was clearly shown to be the extension of the limits of the scale by the introduction of notes and chords foreign to the key. Some of the most novel effects in Grieg's music were produced, the lecturer said, by manipulation of the triads of the minor mode; many other modern composers also showed a predilection to use all the chromatic and diatonic chords of the major scale in the tonic minor, and vice versâ. Grieg used all forms of the minor scale both in his harmonies and melodies, and frequently employed the major triad on the flattened seventh and the major sixth of the minor key. Professor Prout, who occupied the chair, considered, and with good reason, that the prevalence of the flattened seventh in Grieg's music was traceable to the composer's Scandinavian descent, this interval being common to Norwegian and Danish folk-songs. The major sixth of the minor scale was, in the estimation of the chairman, a survival of the Dorian mode.

How the Norwegian composer sometimes set at nought, and, it must be admitted, with charming effect, some of the most firmly established rules of the text-books, was shown in such passages as the following example from the second Humoreske, in which the third of each chord in a descending series of sixths, being placed above the sixth, produced the inevitable consecutive fifths:



The freedom with which chords of the seventh were resolved was carefully pointed out, and the favourite device of the resolution of the leading note on the fifth of the key through the ninth in the chord of the dominant, was illustrated in the following passage from the Albumblatt in F (Op. 47, No. 2):

Several examples were also given of the extensive and distinctive use which both Dvorák and Grieg made of the chord of the augmented sixth. Dr. Sawyer gave quotations of these chords, not only on the flattened supertonic and flattened submediant, but also, as he considered, on the subdominant. The latter chord was, however, objected to by Professor Prout, as entailing the recognition of more than twelve semitones in the key. In his estimation it was not an augmented sixth, but a minor seventh. For instance, the chord F, A, C, D sharp, in the key of C, should be written F, A, C, E flat, the notes being respectively the seventh, ninth, eleventh, and minor thirteenth of the dominant, although it might be resolved like the augmented sixth. This may be put by as a nice little problem for a quiet evening or for a chat by the fireside. With regard to cadences, the lecturer's remarks indicated that any two chords satisfied the Bohemian and Norwegian composers. Thus, in Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" (page 69) was found a cadence formed by a chord of A minor followed by a chord of B:

Grieg went farther than this, for "Der Einsame" contained the following way home to the key of C through a minor seventh on B flat:

Other remarkable excerpts were quoted, together with instances of passages over a pedal note in which, in spite of the dictum of theorists, modulations were freely made. Having shown with what excellent effects the academical laws could be broken, Dr. Sawyer concluded by urging students not to attempt to do so until they had first conscientiously worked through the text-books, had studied the methods of the old masters, and finally had carefully analysed the scores of contemporary composers. Most excellent advice, which it may be hoped that fervid youth will faithfully follow, if only for the sake of future audiences. It should be added that grateful respite from the avalanche of chromatic derivations and complexities poured forth by Dr. Sawyer was now and again given by Miss Kate Sims and Miss Maud Thatcher, from the Royal College of Music, who respectively played and sang in a sympathetic manner several pieces by the composers under dissection. These performances were in themselves eloquent explanations of many passages which at first sight on paper looked appalling, for the interpretation showed the æsthetic truth of the mode of expression, and proved what Dr. Sawyer happily termed the remarkable elasticity of tonality.

"H.M.S. PINAFORE" AT THE GROCERS' COMPANY'S SCHOOL.

The Grocers' Company's School at Hackney has for many years made a specialty of music on its public days. At Christmas time an operetta is given and at Easter an oratorio. Few day schools have such a record to point to. This Christmas the opera selected was Gilbert and Sullivan's ever-popular "H.M.S. Pinafore." The performance was undertaken entirely by the boys, about forty of them forming the chorus. The opera was fully staged and presented in a most complete manner. The School lends itself peculiarly well to theatrical exigencies, the Gymnasium (which holds an audience of 800), in which performances are held, being practically part of the commodious main building. Judging from the quality of the voices and the surprising skill of the performance, it would seem that the atmosphere of north-east London must be in some way conducive to the production of good singers, or that special skill in training, and some unusual stimulus to excellence in the School itself, must be at work. Certainly, we have rarely heard chorus-singing from boys that pleased us so much. The tone was full, round, perfectly in tune, and produced with ease. The principals court criticism not only on their singing, but on their skill as actors. It says volumes for the boys and the all-round ability of the head-master, the Rev. J. Gull, who coached all the performers, that in view of their age their acting was remarkably good. T. Rumbal, who took the part of Sir Joseph Porter, K.C.B., deserves special mention. For a boy of fourteen years of age he showed exceptional talent. F. O. Harriss, as Josephine, also deserves notice for the beauty of his voice and style. The able conductor, Mr. Ernest Newton, the music-master of the School, was assisted by a competent band, in which many of the School staff played. Four performances were given, and they were all attended by large audiences. No money was taken, admission being only obtained by invitation.

REVIEWS.

Choral Society Vocalisation. Instructions and exercises in voice-training to be used at ordinary rehearsals. By J. Stainer. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This book forms the fiftieth volume of Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Music Primers and Educational Series, the value and importance of which can scarcely be over-estimated. No better explanation of the object of the issue under review can be given than the following quotation from the preface: "England may well be proud of her numerous choral societies; they serve the triple purpose of encouraging composers, of making their members familiar with the literature of concerted vocal music, and of periodically giving the public pleasurable and instructive performances. But there is another side to the story; it is in many cases exceedingly difficult to keep them in a state of efficiency, or to get members to maintain their interest in them for any length of time. Loss of efficiency is easily explained; in all such societies it constantly occurs that certain very efficient members insist on retiring, whilst certain very *in*efficient members equally insist on staying. . . . Loss of continued interest may, I believe, be often explained in a manner which may also account for the frequent resignation of efficients. Many good members of choral societies, although they fully recognise the benefit and satisfaction of learning great works, feel inwardly that they are doing more good to other people than they are to themselves. They think that the society is of no value to them individually, and for this reason: it may indeed make them better musicians, but it does not make them better singers. . . . But why cannot each member of a choral society be made a better singer? For the last fifteen years I have had my heart set upon providing conductors of choral societies with a Manual of Exercises in Vocalisation which might be to each member a sort of genuine 'singing lesson.' . . . In my earlier days I was a hard-working and enthusiastic conductor of choral societies, so their needs are known to me by personal experience. I discovered the want of such a manual by having to teach one of my voluntary choirs to sing a series of vocal exercises from memory. But I noticed that when the first quarter of an hour or twenty minutes had thus been devoted to exercises in 'vocalisation' the singing for the rest of the evening was infinitely superior to what it was when they had not been practised at all." There can be little doubt but that in the above words Sir John Stainer has correctly described the cause of much which is unsatisfactory in choral bodies. Moreover, his book is an important recognition of the differentiation which is taking place in musical study with regard to technical ability as apart from æsthetics. The exercises are not for practice in reading at sight, but for the development of each chorister's voice and for the cultivation of unanimity of attack and perfect balance of tone. That these objects will be accomplished by the use of this manual with more or less success, according to the intelligence of the conductor, there can be no doubt after perusal of the exercises, which contain examples of all the ordinary difficulties met with in modern choral writing.

The Troubadours and Courts of Love. By John Frederick Rowbotham, M.A., Oxon. (Swan, Sonnenschein and Co.)

The object of the "Social Series," of which this volume forms a part, is to discuss some important factors which concern the evolution of man, other than war and politics, to which such prominence is usually given in history. The story of the Troubadours, who exerted some influence on the poetry and music of the Middle Ages, is related by Mr. Rowbotham in a very attractive manner. He is, naturally, specially concerned with them in their connection with England. After some introductory pages, telling of the glories of Byzantium and of Provence, the "cradle" of the poet-musicians, our author commences his history proper with William, Count of Poitou, grandfather of Queen Eleanor, wife of Henry II. Later on, he speaks of the discredit thrown on the story of Blondel and King Richard. Considering, however, that it is thoroughly in keeping with the manners of the time, he repeats it, "whether it be true or false." This attitude, perhaps, will explain a few other statements in the book which may not bear strict investigation. We have a picture, fairly accurate, and attractively drawn, of a period in history which has been recorded by chroniclers, not critics. The chapters "The Courts of Love" (for that was "The Age of Love") and "Stories of the Troubadours" are light and entertaining, yet, perhaps, not altogether unprofitable. Mr. Rowbotham has a chapter on "The Troubadours as musicians." He touches upon the state of harmony "at the time of the Troubadours." This expression is somewhat vague; and, further, the rôle which he assigns to the Troubadours in the making of harmony is too prominent. But his book is of small compass, and a brief reference to such an important subject can scarcely meet critical requirements.

Panseron's Forty-two Vocal Exercises. Edited by Alberto Randegger. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This selection of forty-two melodic and progressive vocal exercises for contralto, baritone, or bass, from the second part of Panseron's "Méthode de Vocalisation," may be warmly recommended to all teachers of singing. Panseron's long experience at the Paris Conservatoire in the difficult art of voice cultivation, and the wide acceptance of his method by leading schools of music in France and Belgium, in themselves bear witness to the excellence of his system. But apart from this, a glance at the present volumes is sufficient to show the experienced teacher the great value of the collection. Particular features of the exercises are the ease with which they can be learnt by heart, owing to the sequential form in which they are written, and the admirable regard paid to the division of the vocal registers. It is scarcely necessary to add that the value of the studies has been greatly increased by the marks of expression and phrasing and other important details supplied by Signor Randegger.

Novello's Short Anthems. Nos. 57 and 58. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The first of these anthems is an introit for Quinquagesima Sunday and is a setting, by A. G. Iggulden, of the Collect appointed for that day. It is written for interpretation by an unaccompanied quartet, and four fairly trained voices which harmonise well together could make this anthem an impressive portion of the service. It is eminently devotional in character, and each voice part possesses independence and interest. No. 58 is a setting, by John Stafford Smith (1750-1836), of the Collect for the second Sunday after Epiphany, and is also intended to be sung unaccompanied, but not by four solo voices. The music is taken from a signed MS. copy dated March 8, 1813, in the possession of Mr. Julian Marshall, and is an excellent example of the contrapuntal style which has made English church music famous.

Novello's Octavo Edition of Two-Part Songs for Female Voices. Nos. 97-103. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Mr. Myles B. Foster has provided No. 97, which consists of a melodious and graceful setting of some reflective lines by Somerville Gibney, entitled "Lined with gold," which may be described as a new version of the proverb "There is a silver lining to every cloud." No. 98 is of a more ambitious nature, and is one of the series of "Bird Songs." The text is supplied by M. C. Gillington (Mrs. George F. Byron) and the music by H. A. J. Campbell. To the pianoforte accompaniment are added parts for first and second violins, which are necessary for the music to make its due effect; but the vocal portion is simple in character, and could be sung at sight by a fairly-trained choir. The same author and composer have supplied Nos. 99 to 103, severally entitled "Shadow Dance," written in gavotte form and very pleasing; "The Old Oak," "Berry time," "The Traveller," and "Night Wind." In all these provision is made for first and second violins, in addition to the pianoforte accompaniment, and successful endeavour has been made in the vocal writing to combine simplicity with effectiveness.

Because the Springtime's here. Song. Words by Clifton Bingham. Music by Frank L. Moir.

The Roving Gipsies. Bolero Song. Words by Maud Sidley. Music by J. Christopher Marks.

[Edwin Ashdown.]

The first of these songs is a merry-hearted ditty which, if sung by a flexible soprano voice, could be made effective in the concert-room. The episode, Tempo di Minuet, materially enhances the interest of the composition. "The Roving Gipsies" are of the conventional ideal type; they "dance upon the village green, with castanets and tambourine"; but the song as a whole is bright and spirited, and will doubtless be acceptable to vocalists with a vivacious style.

Schoumka Ukrainienne. Scènes Russes. No. 1. For the Pianoforte. By Félix Borowski. [Laudy and Co.]

In the awakening interest now being evinced in Russian music these pleasing pieces will doubtless be widely welcomed by pianists. The two examples of the Corsaque Dance are excellent specimens of their kind, and if played with spirit and due appreciation of the varying changes of sentiment peculiar to Slavonic music will be found very effective. The first of the "Russian Scenes" is in waltz form, but it possesses individuality and the rhythm is well varied. All these pieces are easy to read.

The Organ Works of John Sebastian Bach. Edited by J. F. Bridge and James Higgs. Book XII.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The present book completes this fine series of Bach's organ works, with the exception of his Choral Preludes and Choral Partitas, and the editors may be most heartily congratulated on the successful termination of their labours, which must not infrequently have occasioned them much earnest thought and careful comparison. The concluding volume comprises eighteen pieces, the most important of which are a brilliant Fugue in G, a Fantasia and Fugue in A minor—a work of considerable length and considerable interest—and a Fantasia in G, which is really in three movements. The notes and suggestions of the editors, which distinguish and form such a valuable feature of the preceding numbers, are continued in this volume, and will doubtless be read with the greatest interest by all organists. The clearness and excellence of the music type greatly facilitates the execution of the pieces.

Second Album of Songs for Children. Words by William Blake. Music by M. U. Arkwright. [Alphonse Cary.]

Nine songs, well conceived and written, and likely to awaken and sustain the interest of little folks, are included in this volume. The vocal part chiefly employs the best portion of a child's voice, and is well supported by the pianoforte accompaniment. The "Laughing Song" and "Spring," by reason of their exuberant gaiety, will probably prove the greatest favourites of juvenile vocalists.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Bayreuth.—A complete Symphony by Siegfried Wagner, a portion of which, under the title "Sehnsucht," has already been heard some time since in London, was performed here for the first time during Christmas week The work, which was very favourably received, is to be submitted to wider musical circles during a Concert tour shortly to be undertaken by the young composer.——Active preparations have been going forward for some time with a view to the performances of the "Nibelungen" Tetralogy during the coming summer. Recently Frau Cosima Wagner superintended a performance of the first act of "Siegfried" at a concert hall here before a small invited audience, the orchestra being represented by two pianofortes, the scenery however being complete. Wagner's son conducted. The two remaining acts are to be rehearsed in the same way. Public interest in the Festspiele would seem to be still on the increase, the applications for tickets this year being more numerous than ever before.

Berlin.—On December 30, at the Singakademie, a Concert of English music was given, under the direction of Professor Villiers Stanford. The band consisted of the Philharmonic orchestra, and Mr. Leonard Borwick and Mr. Plunket Greene respectively played and sang. The programme was as follows: Tragic Overture, Hubert Parry; Concerto for pianoforte (Op. 59), C. V. Stanford; Songs, "Good advice," Maurice Greene, and "Ye twice ten hundred deities," Purcell; Pianoforte solos—Toccata, Purcell, Nocturne (B flat), Field, "L'allegresse," F. E. Bache; three Irish Folk-songs, arranged and orchestrated by C. V. Stanford; Overture, "Britannia," A. C. Mackenzie; Symphony, "L'Allegro ed Il Pensieroso" (Op. 56), C. V. Stanford. The audience, which was large and included many eminent musicians, was remarkably enthusiastic, and the Concert proved in every way a great success, as the press criticisms quoted in another column clearly show.——Herr W. Kienzl's opera "Evangelimann," first brought out in May last, at the Royal Opera (as recorded in these columns), has proved the most successful German operatic novelty of the past year. The work has been repeatedly performed at Cologne, Mannheim, Frankfort-on-Main, and Prague, and is also being mounted in some eighteen other lyrical theatres in the Fatherland.——Herr Otto Dienel, the distinguished organist of the Marienkirche, is giving this winter a series of free Concerts of sacred music with the co-operation of the choir. The church has just been furnished with a magnificent new organ, the work of Messrs. Schlag Soehne, of Schweidnitz.——Dr. Joachim has composed a new Overture, specially intended for performance at the anniversary of the Sing-Akademie. This institution was founded in 1791 by Fasch, cymbalist to Frederick the Great.

Brünn.—A new opera-ballet, entitled "Olga," the libretto by Herr Eugen Brüll, the music by Herr Joseph Bayer, was brought out here last month with great success.

Brussels.—The Théâtre de la Monnaie, which has so frequently afforded to French composers the opportunity of a first performance of their works vainly sought in their own country, brought out, on December 28, a new opera, "Evangéline," by M. Xavier Leroux. The libretto, by MM. De Gramont, Hartmann, and Alexandre, is founded upon Longfellow's celebrated poem, and is divided into four acts. The new work, admirably interpreted, with Mesdames Merey and Armand and M. Bonnard in the principal parts, met with good success, the score being throughout effective and in parts highly dramatic. M. Leroux, who made his début as an operatic composer with "Evangéline," is a pupil of M. Massenet, by whose style he is yet to some extent influenced.——The series of Symphonic Concerts instituted by M. Eugène Ysaye was inaugurated last month in a highly satisfactory manner with an interesting programme, including M. Duparc's "Lénore," the "Marche funèbre pour Guillaume d'Orange," by Huberti, and Beethoven's C minor Symphony. M. Ysaye proved himself a most expert conductor.——In consequence of the success of M. Leroux's "Evangéline" the directors of La Monnaie are now putting into rehearsal a second operatic work by that composer, entitled "William Ratcliff," fragments of which have already been given at one of M. Colonne's Paris Concerts.

Budapest.—At a Concert given here last month by the Philharmonic Orchestra, Anton Bruckner's Symphony, No. 5, was given for the first time and received with enthusiasm. The veteran Viennese master appears to be at length meeting with more general recognition, successful first performances of his symphonic works having also taken place recently at Dresden and Frankfort-on-Main. ——Herr Raoul Mader, the successor of Herr Nikisch in the Capellmeistership at the Royal Opera here, has completed a one-act opera, "Tokaier," which is shortly to be brought out both here and in Vienna.

Carlsruhe.—Considerable success attended the first performance, on the 4th ult., at the Court Theatre, of an opera, "Der Schatz des Rhampsinit," by Herr Albert Gorter, who is his own librettist, and a dramatic composer of talent and originality. Herr Felix Mottl conducted an excellent performance of his colleague's work, the composer being the second Capellmeister at the Opera here.

Christiania.—Edvard Grieg has written a new Pianoforte Quartet, which is spoken of with enthusiasm by those who have heard it. The gifted Norwegian master will probably re-visit London in the course of next summer, when he will doubtless bring with him his new symphonic variations on a popular Norwegian theme, entitled "Legende," recently produced at Copenhagen. Grieg has just had the Knighthood of the Legion of Honour conferred upon him by the French Republic.

Copenhagen.—At one of the excellent Popular Concerts ("Folke-Concerterne") given here, on the 11th ult., under direction of Herr Robert Hansen, Mr. Henry Such was the violinist, and achieved a brilliant success in pieces by Paganini and Svendsen. The young English artist was highly complimented by the King and Queen of Denmark, who were present.

Dortmund.—The fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the Dortmund Musik-Verein has just been celebrated here with a festival performance, vocal and instrumental. During the period in question, the Society has only once changed its conductor—viz., on the death, in 1882, of Herr Breidenstein, its founder, when the present conductor, Herr Janssen, was appointed.

Dresden.—Two important new choral societies have been founded in this capital during the last few months—viz., the Philharmonic Choir, under Herr Curt Hösel's direction; and the Bach-Verein, under that of Herr Waldemar von Baussnern. The former made its début recently with two excellent performances of Liszt's oratorio "St. Elizabeth," while the latter rendered a good account of itself in Bach's cantata "Lobet Gott in seinem Reiche," Mendelssohn's Hundredth Psalm, and other numbers.

Eisenach.—The transfer of the Wagner Museum of Herr Oesterlein to the Villa Reuter having been nearly completed, the collection will very shortly be made accessible to the public. Professor Kürschner has been appointed custodian of the Institution.

Florence.—It is creditably reported here that Verdi has nearly completed the score of an opera on the subject of "The Tempest," the author of the libretto being, of course, Signor Arrigo Boïto. M. Maurel, it is added, is to create the part of Caliban.

Geneva.—Mdlle. C. Ketten, a daughter of one of the senior professors at the Conservatoire, has just made a brilliant début as Mignon in M. Thomas's opera.

Ghent.—M. Henri Maréchal's three-act opera "Calendal," first brought out last year at Rouen, was produced at the Grand-Théâtre last month in the presence of the composer, who had the gratification of witnessing the entire success of his very effective work.

Hamburg.—Without signalising the event in any special way, the well-known Hamburg music-publishing firm of Johann August Böhme has just entered upon the second century of its existence. The firm may claim to have been the first to establish a general musicselling business in Germany, the still older houses of Breitkopf and Härtel, in Leipzig, and Artaria, in Vienna, confining themselves at the time to printing and publishing only. The present chief, Herr Eduard Böhme, is the grandson of the founder.

Helsingfors.—An interesting Concert was given here recently by the Swedish composer, Herr Andreas Hallén, with the co-operation of the Philharmonic orchestra. The programme consisted exclusively of compositions by the Concert-giver, including a Swedish Rhapsody, a ballad, entitled "Skogsraet," for baritone and orchestra, and a Symphonic Suite superscribed "Waldemar," which achieved an enormous success.

Leipzig.—Two well-known music publishing houses have just celebrated interesting anniversaries—viz., the firm of C. F. W. Siegel (R. Linnemann), the fiftieth, and that of P. Pabst, the twenty-fifth year of their establishment.—— The recent first performance at the Gewandhaus of Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust," under Herr Nikisch's masterly direction, was an event of considerable importance in the musical life of this town. The performance was hailed with enthusiasm by a numerous audience, the principal solo interpreters being Fräulein Marcella Pregi (Marguerite), Herr Brandowsky (Faust), and Herr Schelper (Mephisto). ——The fourth Concert of the season, given last month by the Liszt-Verein, was devoted exclusively to the works of Beethoven, in commemoration of the 125th anniversary of the master's birth. An admirable performance was given of the Overtures to "Egmont" and "Leonore" (No. 3), and of the "Eroica" Symphony, under the direction of Herr Zumpe, of Munich.

Lille.—A Festival-Concert devoted to the works of M. Gustave Charpentier has just taken place here. The undertaking met with so much success that the Concert had to be repeated.

Lübeck.—A new fairy opera, entitled "Princess Lisa's Fee," by Miss Mary Wurm, was brought out last month at the Stadt-Theater here, and very favourably received.

Mannheim.—Herr E. N. de Reznicek, the Austrian composer, whose opera "Donna Diana" is just now making the round of German lyrical establishments, has been appointed Capellmeister at the Court Theatre here.

Milan.—The season of La Scala opened with a performance of M. Saint-Saëns's opera "Henry VIII.," the composer, who was present, having conducted the final rehearsals. Although the performance, under Signor Ferrari's direction, was a fine one, it was received with complete indifference by the audience, and the composer, who had not even received the usual compliment of a call before the curtain, left the town the same evening.——Two new operatic works are to be brought out shortly at La Scala—viz., "André Chénier," by Signor Umberto Giordano, and "Zanetto," by Mascagni. Another new work, "La Cortigiana," by Signor A. Scontrino, is in active preparation at the Dal Verme Theatre.

Moscow.—A new operetta, "Madame sans Gêne," the music by two Russian composers, MM. Dluéki and Werani, has just been brought out with considerable success at the Schelapugin Theatre. Humperdinck's "Hänsel and Gretel" is being mounted on three stages here, notably at the Ssolodownikoff Theatre, under the direction of Herr Bullerjahn.

Munich.—Herr Levi, the distinguished principal conductor at the Royal Opera, has been obliged, on account of continued ill-health, to resign the position he has held for so many years. It is hoped, however, that his valuable services will still be occasionally available at an institution which he has done so much to raise to the foremost rank in Germany.

Naples.—The first performance here of Wagner's "Die Walküre," which inaugurated the season of the San Carlo Theatre, was a great success, despite some noisy hostile demonstrations on the part of a few persons having a private grudge against the management—a not unusual occurrence at Naples on first nights. Signor Mancinelli was the conductor. There was a series of enthusiastic counter-demonstrations on the second performance, December 29, and the work has been produced since as often as four times a week to full houses.——A very favourable reception has been accorded at the Teatro Mercadante to a new opera, entitled "Onore," the libretto by M. F. Verdinois, the music by Signor Consiglio.

Pernambuco.—A musical Conservatorio, founded by Dr. Barboza Lima, has just been opened in this town under the best auspices. The new Institution is provided with an excellent staff of professors, under the direction of Senhor Luiz Morena.

Pesaro.—Special celebrations are to take place this month of Rossini's birthday at the Liceo founded by him, and now under the direction of Signor Mascagni. Among the works to be performed will be the "Messe Solennelle" of the master, in which some of the leading artists of Italy will take part. Rossini was born on February 29, 1792, and, following up the facetious custom instituted by the Maëstro himself during his lifetime, his birthday is only recognised every four years, when leap year comes round.

Rome.—Signor Leoncavallo's new opera "Tommaso Chatterton," the libretto based upon the drama of Alfred de Vigny, will shortly be produced at the Teatro Nazionale, the date of the performance to be fixed by the Queen of Italy, who has promised to be present.——After having been closed for the last seven years, in consequence of the withdrawal of the municipal subvention, the Teatro Argentina re-opened its doors on December 28 with Wagner's "Die Walküre." The work, which had been exceedingly well mounted, and carefully rehearsed under the direction of Signor Mascheroni, met with a brilliant success, with Madame Adini, who sang the part of Brünnhilde at La Scala, Signora Pandolfini, and Signor Guacarrini in leading parts.——The performance, on the 17th ult., at the Pantheon, of Signor Sgambati's Requiem Mass in honour of Victor Emanuel, is looked upon here as a musical event of considerable importance. The work, which is of a martial and triumphant character, appropriate to the commemoration of the soldier king, undoubtedly forms the most important addition to Italian church music in our time. It was admirably rendered by the chorus of the Philharmonic Society, with a choir of boys' voices and full orchestra, and evoked great enthusiasm from a select audience.

Rouen.—The successful first performance took place last month, at the Théâtre des Arts, of a comic opera, "La Megère apprivoisée," with Miss Maud Roude in the principal part. As may be inferred from the title, the libretto is founded upon Shakespeare's "The Taming of the Shrew," the composer being a young musician, M. Le Rey.

St. Petersburg.—A new opera, "Nuit de Noël," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, was produced recently at the Imperial Opera and received with much favour. The circumstance of the Empress Catharina II. being represented on the stage in the new work has given umbrage in high quarters, and the libretto had to be revised accordingly. ——The projected performance of a cycle of Wagner's works at the Imperial Opera here, under the management of Herr Pollini, of Hamburg, has been abandoned on account of insufficient public support. The exorbitant prices for seats demanded by the famous impresario are said to have been the cause of the failure.

Santiago.—The recent performance here of the first operatic work written by a Chilian composer, Señor Ortiz de Zarate, merits a record. It is entitled "Fioraia de Lugano," and its reception was a very favourable one.

Stockholm.—The well-known pianist, Herr Franz Rummel, has just completed a most successful Concert-tour in Norway and Sweden, in the course of which he appeared at two Symphony Concerts given at the Royal Opera here, in the presence of King Oscar.

Turin.—The recent first performance, at the Teatro Regio, of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung," met with an enthusiastic reception, special applause being bestowed upon Madame von Ehrenstein, in the part of Brünnhilde. The Philharmonic Society in this town has conferred its honorary diploma for arts and sciences upon the lady in recognition of her superb interpretation of the part.

Venice.—An excellent performance of a new Mass, entitled "Missa Marciana," took place in Christmas week at the Church of St. Mark's. The work, truly religious in sentiment, is written for four parts with organ, the composer being Signor Lorenzo Perosi, the Maëstro di Capella of St. Mark's.

Vienna.—Already preparations are going forward for the celebration of the birth centenary of Franz Schubert. The Municipal Council have decided to hold an exhibition, at the Historical Museum here, of portraits of the composer, autographs, and other Schubertiana. There will also be festival performances on the part of the Schubert-Bund and the Maenner-Gesangverein, and a representation of the comic opera "Der häusliche Krieg" ("Domestic Warfare") at the Opera.——Johann Strauss's new operetta, "Waldmeister," has been brought out with great success at the Theater an der Wien, under the personal direction of the veteran composer. The music of the new work, to which Herr G. Davis has furnished the libretto, is considered equal to "Die Fledermaus" and others of Herr Strauss's most popular operettas.——Carl Goldmark's new comic opera, "The Cricket on the Hearth," is to be brought out at the Imperial Opera next month.——Mr. and Mrs. Henschel have just given a series of highly successful Vocal Recitals in this capital.——Herr Kienzl's opera "Evangelimann" was produced at the Imperial Opera on the 11th ult., and met with an enthusiastic reception.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society gave its fortieth annual Christmas performance of "The Messiah" on Boxing Night. The valuable services rendered by Mr. Stockley to this Society for thirty-nine consecutive years deserve just acknowledgment. Under his tuition the choristers have acquired a sound knowledge of every bar in the score, and Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap, the new conductor, had evidently little to alter in the way of tempi and proper accentuation, although in many respects the whole performance showed the imprint of his own individuality as regards light and shade and the manner in which the accompaniments were effected. The principals were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hannah Jones, Mr. Edwin Wareham, and Mr. Douglas Powell. Mr. C. W. Perkins presided at the organ with his accustomed skill, and Mr. Walter Morrow, who was specially engaged, played the trumpet obbligato with splendid tone. Altogether the performance was an exceptionally fine one.

The musical season of 1896 began with a Concert given by the Meister Glee Singers, in the Town Hall, on the 6th ult. All the part-songs were received with the greatest enthusiasm. Valuable assistance was given by Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Greta Williams, Miss Adelina de Lara (pianoforte), Mr. Edward Howell (violoncello), Mr. C. W. Perkins (organ), and Madame Hast (accompanist). It is a pity that a pianist of Miss de Lara's standing should have chosen for her soli such drawing-room trifles as a transcription of Jensen's song "Murmuring breezes" and pieces by Stojowski, which now-a-days are within the capabilities of every school girl.

The Birmingham Amateur Opera Society, which has done good service for the last nine years in producing Gilbert and Sullivan's operas in an efficient manner, gave, on the 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th ult., performances of the "Pirates of Penzance," in connection with the Midland Institute annual Conversazione. With the exception of the "Gondoliers," every opera in the popular series has been submitted to local audiences, and in every instance the result proved highly satisfactory. The orchestral accompaniments have always been and are still a special feature at these performances, and, in order to obtain proper balance in every department, the aid of professional players is naturally of incalculable value.

The musical season after the Christmas recess re-opened on the 16th ult., on which date, according to long custom, the "ladies' night" of the Bristol Madrigal Society fell. Like many time-honoured and conservative institutions the Society has yielded to some changes which are called for by modern demands, and now, instead of the programme being filled almost exclusively with madrigals and kindred pieces of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, compositions by later as well as living writers are incorporated. So, side by side with such familiar, quaint, and charming effusions as "The Lady Oriana" and "Flora gave me fairest flowers" (Wilbye), "When April deck'd" (Marenzio), "When all alone" (Converso), "Sumer is y cumen in"—the choicest of early English musical treasures—"When Thoralis" (Weelkes), and "In going to my lonely bed" (Edwards) were placed Pearsall's beautiful "I saw lovely Phillis," his merry "Allan-a-Dale," and his fine tone-picture "Sir Patrick Spens," Leslie's melodious "Charm me asleep," Reay's "Sweet is the breath," and Mendelssohn's "Season of pleasure." Villiers Stanford was represented by his "Corydon, arise," and C. Lee Williams by his "Twilight." Morley's "Hard by a crystal fountain," a madrigal for six voices, was now given for the first time in public by the Society; while the absolute novelties were "New Year looking forth" (words by Spencer), written for the famous body of singers by Miss Rosalind Ellicott, and "About the bag of a bee" (words by Herrick), penned by Mrs. Goodeve, a local lady. The whole of the pieces contained in the interesting and well-arranged programme were delightfully sung, under the direction of Mr. D. W. Rootham, and afforded great enjoyment to the large assemblage that gathered at the Victoria Rooms to hear them. The Concert fittingly opened with the National Anthem (Horsley's arrangement) and closed, as usual, with Saville's "The Waits."

No other actual Concert of note has taken place, but the services rendered by a section of the Society of Bristol Gleemen, on New Year's Day, deserves brief record. On that day nearly six thousand aged poor were feasted, at several centres, by the Mayor and Sheriff; and the vocalists named added to the enjoyment of many of them by singing (under Mr. W. J. Kidner's direction) some of the best pieces in the Society's répertoire.

The weekly entertainments, chiefly musical, in the magnificent Pump Room of the Clifton Spa commenced on the first Saturday of the New Year.

Undoubtedly the most momentous event, which will, apparently, have an important bearing upon the future of music in Bristol, has been brought about by the death of the late Sir Charles Hallé, whose loss is deeply deplored in our city. For the purposes of the Festival of 1896 (which the deceased knight would have conducted had he lived), the Bristol Festival and the Bristol Choral Societies have agreed to unite, and the post of conductor has been offered to and accepted by Mr. George Riseley. But before definite steps can be taken a guarantee fund of at least £4,000 must be raised. With a view of obtaining this, the joint-committee met on the 15th ult. and framed a circular, which has been sent out. It is confidently expected that the required number of guarantors of £10 will be forthcoming, and then, should the cordiality and unanimity which have characterised the proceedings of the joint-committee up to the present continue, the Festival in the autumn will undoubtedly be a great artistic success, as it is hoped it may be financially.

Midsomer Norton and District Choral Society gave a performance of Handel's "Messiah" on the 7th ult., in the Public Hall, Norton. For so young a body of vocalists the interpretation of the Saxon's masterpiece was exceptionally good, if not faultless, upon which the singers and Mr. Walter J. Kidner, the conductor, are to be congratulated. The soloists were Miss Florence Cromey, Mrs. King, Mr. C. Gregory, and Mr. J. W. Davey, who acquitted themselves creditably.

MUSIC IN CAMBRIDGE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Concerts of the Michaelmas Term have included but few beyond those given under the auspices of the Cambridge University Musical Society. The only one of this character calling for mention in these columns is the Pianoforte and Violin Recital of Signor Sarasate and Madame Berthe Goldschmidt, on November 19.

The Wednesday Popular Concerts opened their season with Messrs. Borwick and Greene's Recital, on October 23. Perhaps the most striking feature in the programme was Mr. Greene's rendering of the whole of the "Dichterliebe." It was truly a wonderful performance. The second Concert was on November 20. The programme included the Overture to "Coriolan," Mozart's G minor Symphony, and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. Mr. Fernandez Arbos was the solo violinist and Mr. J. Reed the vocalist. At the third Concert, on November 20, Mr. Gompertz's Quartet Party gave Beethoven's Quartet in A (Op. 18) and Dvorák's in E flat (No. 3). Miss Harding was the vocalist.

The Cambridge University Musical Society also gave a performance in Trinity Chapel on December 2; Purcell was represented in the programme by the magnificent "Jehova quam multi" and "Remember not." A chorus by Bach, "Christen ätzet diesen Tag," edited by Mr. Sedley Taylor, the President of the Society, was given in its English form ("Christians, grave ye this glad day"). This is a splendid work, and, now that it is available in English dress, should be widely taken up by church choirs and choral societies. Mr. H. P. Allen was at the organ and played Bach's Toccata in D minor and Handel's Concerto (No. 4) with orchestral accompaniment.

College Societies usually hibernate during the October and Lent Terms—Smoking Concerts being the utmost that they attempt. An exception to the rule was the performance at Christ's of Bach's "Gottes Zeit," under the guidance of the College's energetic organist, Mr. H. P. Allen.

The Musical Club has had a successful term, and is to be congratulated on having at last obtained a room more worthy of it. In fact, the prospects of this admirable Institution were never so bright.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Norfolk and Norwich School of Music, the opening of which was noticed in these columns last April, is making satisfactory progress, and, judging from the capital Concert given at the close of the autumn term, the teaching is bearing good fruit, several of the students showing evident signs of improvement since the previous musical evening. The secretary announced a revised scale of fees, commencing with the New Year.

On the Friday evening before Christmas a special Service was held in Norwich Cathedral, when Spohr's "Last Judgment" was sung. Master White, Messrs. Hemmings, Brooks, and Brockbank were the soloists, and gave the principal numbers with feeling and solemnity. The choruses would have sounded better with an increased choir, and a body of instrumentalists would have added much to the general effect. Dr. Bates presided at the organ, and the Dean (Dr. Lefroy) gave a short address between the parts of the oratorio. The limited number present is easily explained by the fact that no publicity was given to the service.

Dr. Bunnett's series of popular Organ Recitals, in St. Andrew's Hall, interrupted by the Christmas holidays, were re-commenced on the 11th ult. The Doctor received a warm welcome from the large audience assembled. Miss May Seiber, a local resident and possessor of a fine contralto voice, and Mr. Sawford Dye (tenor) were the vocalists, while Master Percy Green (violin) delighted the audience with a capital rendering of Bach's Chaconne and a Polacca by Trouselle. These Recitals, promoted by the Corporation, are valuable educational helps; the admission is only twopence, and the programme is filled with good music, an Organ Sonata by one of the great masters being not unfrequently given.

At a special Service held in St. Margaret's Church, King's Lynn, on the 8th ult., Parts 4 and 5 of Bach's Christmas Oratorio were performed, and, considering the difficulty of the work, with commendable correctness. To reinforce his own choir, the organist (Mr. H. B. Collins) secured the assistance of members of other church choirs in the town, as well as a number of ladies, so that the choruses could be given with effect. A small but capable band, led by Mr. Noverre, rendered useful assistance, and Mr. J. H. Pratt presided at the organ. The quartet of principal vocalists were Miss Beloe (soprano), Mrs. Monkman (contralto), Mr. A. H. Cross (tenor), and Mr. G. R. Oswell (bass). Between the parts the Rev. E. J. Alvis, a neighbouring clergyman, gave an address, dwelling chiefly upon the introduction and development of oratorio, and three of its greatest composers—Purcell, Bach, and Handel.

another column—musical life in Edinburgh last month ran in its accustomed quiet groove. The Scottish Orchestra seems to have reached its highest point of attainment for this year, and, to tell the truth, that highest point falls short of what we all hoped. The ever increasing attention to nuance has by no means developed into breadth of treatment, and occasionally descends into jerky mannerism.

That Mr. Kes is an excellent musician of surprisingly varied attainments was again proved at the fifth Concert, when Lady Hallé's inability to fulfil her engagement might have been so awkward for the Concert-givers. But Mr. Kes joined Mr. Sons, his excellent leader, in a really charming performance of Bach's double Concerto, accompanied most carefully by the orchestra. Nothing could have better shown his command over his forces, or their loyal obedience to his every wish. The rendering of "Leonora" (No. 3) was more novel than beautiful, and a Symphony by Saint-Saëns, to which two performers on the pianoforte contributed half-a-dozen arpeggios and the organ a few chords, did not come up to any extravagant expectations, except in its length.

At the sixth Concert (6th ult.) Madame Duma was the vocalist, and was recalled three times for her second aria, "Elizabeth's Greeting," from "Tannhäuser." The orchestral numbers were Saint-Saëns's "Phaëton," Brahms's beautiful Variations on the Haydn theme (excellently played), Bach's G minor Fugue, carrying Abert's chorale like an "Old Man of the Sea" (enthusiastically applauded), and Massenet's clever Suite "Les Erinnyes." At the seventh Concert the Choral Union, in "Elijah," made its best appearance for many, many years. It is true they had the advantage of Mr. Andrew Black's great reading of the Prophet's rôle, and Mr. Herbert Grover, a hitherto unknown singer here, was a marked success in the beautiful arias assigned to the tenor. But the secret of the great triumph lay first in the fruits of Mr. Collinson's careful training for many years, and the gradual and steady improvement in quality and balance; and, secondly, in the fact that Mr. Collinson conducted his own forces and permitted no such tricks on the part of the Scottish Orchestra as disfigured the previous choral performance and so annoyed the audience. Miss Maggie Davies was most successful in "Hear ye, Israel," Miss Marion Brown won great applause for "O rest in the Lord," and the Youth's music was beautifully sung by Miss Marguerite Simpson. The orchestra accompanied excellently.

The scheme of Saturday evening Popular Concerts is as popular as ever. A packed house greeted Mr. E. C. Hedmondt, at the first Concert, with the utmost enthusiasm, and he justified it in his artistic singing of two Lieder by Schumann and Jensen. As an encore, unanimously demanded, he sang "Ich grolle nicht." Mr. Kes played the pianoforte accompaniments with the greatest taste. Walther's "Preislied" was also warmly applauded, and Mr. Hedmondt's third contribution was a well known aria from "Der Freischütz." The orchestral selections would have been better for a little more weight; an occasional Symphony would prove very acceptable. But the band played the "Kaisermarsch," Overture to "Mignon," the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Scherzo, and a selection from Delibes's "Sylvia" with due appreciation. "Die Verkaufte Braut," by Dvorák, and Tschaïkowsky's Overture "1812" were repeated from earlier programmes, and Saint-Saëns's sparkling Tarantelle for flute and clarinet was excellently played by Messrs. Halstead and Mills.

At the second Popular Concert Miss Agnes Jansen was the vocalist, and sang the scena from "Samson and Delilah" and two songs in a way which drew an encore from her delighted audience. Mr. Kes again proved himself a more than excellent accompanist. The March from "Tannhäuser" does not gain in its orchestral setting, but the orchestra was happy alike in "Oberon" and in "William Tell." The Moszkowsky Suite, already heard, two dainty orchestral trifles (the "Funeral March of a Marionette" and "Mignon" Gavotte), and Liszt's "Venezia Napoli" concluded the programme.

On New Year's Day the Choral Union gave the usual mid-day performance of "The Messiah," and was rewarded by an overflowing house. The same evening the Popular Ballad Concert was also successful in drawing a large audience with a "Scotch" programme.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE response to a recent appeal on behalf of the Choral and Orchestral Union has not, it is to be feared, proved successful. Subscription lists were re-opened for the second half of the series of Concerts, in the belief that the admitted musical success of the scheme would loose the purse-strings of many influential amateurs who have hitherto held aloof. And in this fresh appeal the management had ample warrant, because the deplorable subscription list which has this season fallen to the lot of the Union points to only one conclusion—the utter abandonment of the Concerts at no distant date. Possibly enough, the undue length of the season has still a great deal to do with the position of matters. A series of Concerts extending over a period of sixteen weeks is, indeed, a very large order for "Musical Glasgow"!

The Choral Union New Year's Day programme is always a remarkably safe one, and on the first morning of the current year "The Messiah" drew to St. Andrew's Hall the usual overflowing audience. It is needless for anybody to prate against the abiding popularity of Handel's work. The people obviously want it. On this occasion the soloists included Mesdames Fanny Moody and Dews, Mr. John Child, and Mr. Charles Manners. The Scottish Orchestra was, of course, again engaged, Mr. Berry was at the organ, and Mr. Joseph Bradley conducted. Generally speaking, the Union sang with unabated power and to the entire satisfaction of the audience. In the evening the customary Popular Concert was given by the Scottish Orchestra, and on the 7th ult. the management had again to face a lamentably small audience. The programme comprised Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem "Phaëton," Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Haydn's, Beethoven's "Leonora" (No. 3) Overture, and a selection from Massenet's Suite "Les Erinnyes." There was an attractive vocalist in the person of Miss Medora Henson, and Mr. Kes again showed the fine material at his command, as also his able powers at the conductor's desk. On the following Saturday (11th ult.) there was a very welcome feature in the programme—Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony. Other more or less popular numbers comprised the Overtures to "Euryanthe," "Rienzi," and Guiraud's "Piccoline," and Miss Jessie Scott, a débutante of considerable promise, sang. At the ninth Classical Concert of the series, Mr. Maurice Sons, the accomplished leader of the orchestra, appeared as the soloist in Brahms's Concerto in D. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" were also in the somewhat severe programme; and there was again a very discouraging audience. On the 15th ult. "The Messiah" was performed in the City Hall under the auspices of the Glasgow Choral Union, when Miss Jenny Taggart made her début in her native city. It was very soon made apparent that the young soprano had been well trained. Madame Marchesi derives, indeed, infinite credit from her pupil, and more will be heard of Miss Taggart's beautiful voice and cultured method before long, if we are not greatly mistaken. The other soloists were Miss Ada Crossley, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Lempriere Pringle. Mr. Bradley conducted with all his wonted care, and a good all-round performance has to be recorded.

Dvorák's "The Spectre's Bride" and the Grail Scene from Wagner's "Parsifal" comprised the programme for the evening of the 21st ult., with Miss Esther Palliser, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint as soloists. Glasgow amateurs did not, unfortunately, rise to the occasion; all the more surprising when we remember the melodic beauty and strong dramatic character of the Bohemian composer's workmanship. The Wagnerian excerpt was heard for the first time in Scotland, and both works were accorded a good interpretation, albeit the accompaniments by the Scottish Orchestra were somewhat aggressive. Mr. Bradley conducted.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

SIR A. C. MACKENZIE was engaged to conduct the initial Philharmonic Concerts of the present year, given respectively on the 7th and 21st ult. For the first of these Lady Hallé had been announced, but her place was taken by Mr. Hollman, who gave a fine rendering of Saint-Saëns's familiar Violoncello Concerto. The chief orchestral pieces were Edward German's Leeds Suite in D minor and the conductor's "Britannia" Overture, the latter being followed by the recall of the composer amidst plaudits which were alike appreciative and patriotic. At the second Concert of those alluded to Mr. Brodsky gave a most facile reading of the difficulties of Vieuxtemps's D minor Concerto for violin, and with Mr. Vieuxtemps (violoncello) and Mr. F. Dawson (pianoforte) shared Beethoven's triple Concerto.

For the first time within memory the Liverpool Orchestral Society ventured a benefit Concert, on the 11th ult., in the Philharmonic Hall, under Mr. A. E. Rodewald, and rendered a very excellent account of itself in Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony and other important selections. A feature of the Concert was the singing of the Goossens Choir, which, though an open rehearsal had been given some time ago, had not previously made an actual public appearance. The organisation consists of about forty male voices, and the repertory drawn from hitherto has been that of purely descriptive vocal music, which has not, up to the present, achieved much of a footing in this country. The members of the choir sing without book, and imparted to Heger's "Survivors of Tydal" and Gevaert's "Hymn of Saul" an exceptional amount of dramatic force and colour.

Two Orchestral Concerts have been given by the Sunday Society in St. George's Hall. At one of these Mr. Theodore Lawson gave a happy rendering of Spohr's "Dramatic" Concerto for violin, and at the other Mr. H. S. Welsing performed with excellent effect Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto for pianoforte. There has been nothing else to note during the past few weeks, which have been essentially of the holiday order, pantomime having taken the place of opera at the Court Theatre, for the first time, since its rehabilitation by the Royal Carl Rosa Company.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

Usually in the first month of the year there is a slight lull in musical matters here; and so, during January, little has occurred needing report except the steady continuance of the Hallé Concerts, under various conductors. With the experienced direction of Mr. Henschel and the assistance of Miss Palliser, Messrs. Andrew Black, David Bispham, and Hedmondt the first and third acts of "Lohengrin" were bound to go well, the more especially as both band and choir had enjoyed previous opportunities of becoming familiar with the latter portion of the work. At the succeeding meeting, on the 9th, we had an extremely effective rendering of the "Eroica" Symphony, under Mr. Brodsky, the March being played with a dirge-like solemnity which took the thoughts of the listeners back to the sad morning of the funeral of Sir Charles Hallé, when it formed the last tribute to their departed chief paid by those who had, during so many years, served under him. It was scarcely prudent, however, after an absorbing Symphony lasting some fifty-seven minutes, for Mr. Leonard Borwick to present the Concerto in B flat of Brahms, also a work needing persistent attention; but, in spite of many charming passages, it lacked the freshness and clearness which, during Beethoven's great masterpiece, keep the mind intent and unwearied. Altogether, the programme was far too long, and it was a great testimony to the popularity of Mr. Borwick that so many remained to hear Liszt's Etude in F minor and the Prelude of Rachmaninoff, and still to insist upon further evidence of the player's skill. Miss Mabel Berrey made her first appearance at the Subscription Concerts, and thoroughly established her position, especially by her singing of the lighter Lieder of the second part. With an agreeable voice of moderate range and strength, carefully cultivated, and of complete steadiness, she unites a pleasing power of tender expression and of apt phrasing. For the 16th ult. Mr. F. H. Cowen arranged a programme of considerable attractiveness; but his audience would have been pleased had some of his own works found a place in it—for example, the "Welsh" Symphony, which has not yet had a hearing in Manchester. It would have been welcome, and it need not have displaced the delightful "Gipsy" Suite of Edward German, a rapidly rising master who will, we hope, be invited to assume the bâton on some early occasion, and to bring with him his Leeds Suite. The "Gipsy" Suite met with remarkable success. We have always advocated the duty as well as urged the prudence of cultivating our own resources and of fostering native talent, and we congratulate those who now control matters upon such increased liberality in this direction as moved them to intrust the singing on the 9th, the pianoforte playing on the 16th, and the conducting on the 23rd to local artists, all fully competent to undertake the responsibilities confided to them. Miss St. Angelo's interpretation of the Concerto in G minor of Saint-Saëns, and her manipulation of the Valse Caprice of Rubinstein were admirably clear and skilful, and the violoncello playing of Mr. Hugo Becker is always finished, masterly, and of refined tone.

For the "Golden Legend," on the 23rd, Miss Medora Henson, Miss Clara Butt, Messrs. Ben Davies, A. S. Kinnell, and Watkin Mills were engaged—all efficient, especially the contralto, who greatly advanced her position because, added to the great beauty of her voice and distinctness of enunciation for which all were prepared, she entered more deeply into the meaning of the part of Ursula than we looked for. The band, and especially the choir, seemed determined to do credit to the Manchester conductor, Mr. R. H. Wilson; and more (in our anxiety about the future of oratorio here) may depend upon his success than some people think.

That we do not easily forget old friends was proved by the large gathering, on the 18th, at the Free Trade Hall, to welcome Mr. Willy Hess, and by the uproarious applause with which the "Fantaisie Appassionata" of Vieuxtemps and the "Polonaise" of Laub were received. And that a Concert Hall audience should, on the 20th, have been moved out of its proverbial apathy, has done more to inspire a hope for the future of the Gentlemen's Concerts than anything that has recently happened.

Mr. Max Mayer gave, on the 13th ult., his second Chamber Concert, with the assistance of Mr. Hugo Becker, Mr. Risegari, and Miss Mary Hillhouse. It is to be hoped that the Chamber Concerts which Mr. Carl Fuchs so ably controls at the Schiller-Anstalt and those of Mr. Max Mayer at the Concert Hall may become firmly established. The lack of adequate support for such undertakings has hitherto been greatly to our discredit, and increased self-dependence in this direction, added to a greater liberality of appreciation in widening the entrance to our orchestral programmes, would tend to develop and to encourage an amount of local ability at present very little suspected by the general public.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

The executive of the Hanley Musical Festival met on the 15th ult., at Trentham, by invitation of the Duchess of Sutherland. It was decided to hold three Concerts on October 28 and 29. In addition to Mr. Elgar's new cantata, Sir A. Sullivan's "Light of the World," Beethoven's Choral Symphony, and Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride" are the suggested works. Various committees were appointed and Mr. H. J. Wildin (Stoke) will act as honorary secretary.

Before a numerous audience, on the 6th ult., Mr. Wooley, of Stoke, gave a Chamber Concert in the Town Hall. The instrumentalists were local, and, assisted by Miss Bessie Taylor and Mr. Charles Walton, a capital programme was presented.

On the 9th ult. "The Spirit of the Year," by H. and A. Page, was performed in Stoke Town Hall. Mr. T. Hammersley conducted and Miss Mellor acted as accompanist.

The Meakin Concerts continue to attract large audiences, and on the 13th ult. the spacious Victoria Hall was once more crowded with an attentive and enthusiastic audience, Mr. Santley being the chief attraction. The Misses Clara and Marianne Eissler, Miss Teresa Blamy, and Miss Florence Hoskins contributed to the programme. Mr. G. Barlow, at the organ, and Mr. W. T. Bonner, at the pianoforte, rendered valuable assistance.

Mr. J. W. Turner's English Opera Company occupied the Theatre Royal, Hanley, for six nights, from the 20th. The programme included "Maritana," "Faust," "Robin Hood," and the "Bohemian Girl."

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

Certain performances of "The Messiah" were alluded to in our last month's record of musical events in this district. In addition to these the ever-popular oratorio was heard in Alnwick on December 18, where it was performed in the Corn Exchange by the Alnwick Choral Union, under the direction of Mr. C. E. Moore; and on December 27, in St. James's Church, Morpeth, under the direction of Mr. Brewis, the organist of the church. The chorus was drawn from the choirs of the various places of worship—both Church of England and Nonconformist—in the town.

The Tynemouth Amateur Vocal Society gave the first Invitation Concert of its fourth season in St. Oswin's Hall, Tynemouth, on December 19, the principal works performed on the occasion being Mendelssohn's 13th Psalm and Alice Mary Smith's "Ode to the North-East Wind." The principal vocalists were Miss Lily Heenan and Miss Atkinson; Mr. William Bird conducted, and Miss Clara Herbert discharged the duties of accompanist. The programme also included several instrumental pieces, in the performance of which Mr. J. H. Beers (violin) and Mr. S. Beers (violoncello) were very successful.

The annual Christmas Concert in aid of the funds of the Berwick Infirmary was given on December 27, by the Berwick Choral Union. The programme consisted of Mr. Alfred R. Gaul's sacred cantata "The Holy City" and selections from "The Messiah."

The Newcastle Chamber Music Society gave its third regular Concert of the season in the Assembly Rooms, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the 22nd ult., the principal piece in the programme being Brahms's Clarinet Quintet (Op. 115), which was led by Mr. Ernest Schiever.

The recently-formed Sunderland Musical Society made its first public appearance in the Victoria Hall, Sunderland, on the 21st ult., when the principal work selected for performance was Cowen's "Rose Maiden." The solo vocalists were Madame Marie Lewis, Madame Emilie Harris, Mr. D. S. Macdonald, and Mr. Morgan Wilkinson. The orchestra and chorus numbered about 200 performers, and the conductor was Mr. Oscar Cohen.

The third Harrison Concert took place in Olympia, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the 29th ult. The vocalists were Miss Evangeline Florence, Madame Alice Gomez, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Andrew Black. Part-songs were admirably sung by the Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir, under the conductorship of Madame Clara Novello Davies, and instrumental pieces were performed by Miss Madeleine Tenhave (pianoforte) and Miss Ethel Barns (violin). The accompanist was Mr. Joseph Speaight.

The Gateshead Choral Society, the membership of which is largely supplemented by Newcastle vocalists, contemplates changing its name to the Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Society. The rehearsals and concerts already take place in Newcastle.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTHERN COUNTIES.

After Christmas festivities musical matters are generally at a standstill in this district for some time. The Sarum Choral Society's usual Christmas Concert was postponed until the 28th ult., too late for notice this month. The programme consisted of selections from Handel's oratorios, and Mr. W. T. Bowey was announced as the conductor.

The Test Valley Musical Society, which is now in its sixteenth season, will give Concerts in the County Hall, Salisbury, and the Guildhall, Winchester, on the 10th and 11th inst. The orchestra of the Society, led by Miss A. C. Baker, will play Handel's Concerto Grosso (No. 7) in B flat, Tschaikowsky's Elegie for strings, and Grimm's Suite in Canon Form (Op. 10). The vocal portion of the programme will include the first chorus from Brahms's "Requiem," the Hymn of the Spirits of Arimanes, from Schumann's "Manfred," and madrigals and part-songs by Stanford, Leslie, Orlando di Lasso, Pearsall, Hatton, and Edward German. Miss Montagu will be the solo vocalist on each occasion and the Rev. E. H. Moberly will conduct.

At the Symphony Concerts given during the past month in the Pavilion, Bournemouth, under the direction of Mr. Dan Godfrey, Jun., Haydn's "Military" Symphony, Schubert's "Tragic" (No. 4), Beethoven's (No. 1), and Mendelssohn's Symphony from "The Hymn of Praise" have been performed. A Musical Matinée was given by Madame Felicie Mathieu, assisted by Madame Newling, Mrs. Thelwall, Miss Edythe Oakley, and Signor Bertoncini, in the Bourne Hall Concert Room, on the 9th ult. Madame Mathieu was heard to advantage in pianoforte solos by Chopin, Scharwenka, and Mendelssohn; and Signor Bertoncini played two violin solos with his accustomed ability. A successful Concert was given by the St. Stephen's Choir, assisted by a few friends, on the 9th ult.; a miscellaneous programme was provided. Mr. de Greef gave a Pianoforte Recital, at the Shaftesbury Hall, on the 18th ult.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

For the past month music in Yorkshire has consisted chiefly of the usual "Messiah" outbreak at Christmastide, followed by a period of comparative, if not absolute inactivity. To attempt to render anything like a complete account of the multitude of "Messiah" Concerts that have been given in this most choral and most Handelian of counties would be difficult, and would certainly be tedious; a better plan will be to review some of the more important Concerts that took place during the week before Christmas, endeavouring at the same time to point out in what respect they show an advance on previous years. The inclusion of Handel's "Messiah" in the programme of the Leeds Festival, after an absence of so many years (it was last performed in 1874), was certain to have at least one good result, in inducing more thoughtful readings of the work than were hitherto customary. The fact that all the chief choral societies of the West Riding contributed to the Festival chorus has served to produce a wholesome spirit of emulation, the result of which has been manifested in many directions. And, whatever may be the opinion of Sir Arthur Sullivan's readings, the mere fact that he thought it necessary to devote a full rehearsal to "The Messiah" music must have had an influence for good. Familiarity with a work performed more frequently than any other has, as might be expected, brought about slipshod treatment in many matters of detail. Taking the five representative societies we propose to deal with in chronological order, the Bradford Old Choral Society, of which Mr. Hartwell Robertshaw is the conductor, comes first. In its performance of "The Messiah," on December 16, the principals were Miss Emily Davies, Miss Jessie King, Mr. Gawthrop, and Mr. W. H. Burgon. The distinguishing merits of the performance were the freshness and vigour of the chorus and the evident care paid by the conductor to matters of detail. Its worst feature was the number of evil traditions that were still adhered to—arbitrary attempts at "expression," or the slipshod method of leaving the cadences in the airs unsupported save by a bald bass. The inferiority of the orchestra to the chorus is in provincial choral societies' concerts a matter of course, and will remain so till we have professional local orchestras. The discrepancy was, however, less noticeable in the next performance we have to review—that of the Dewsbury Choral Society, on December 17. Here Franz's edition of the Handel-Mozart score was used, for the second time. In point of general intelligence and careful attention to every possible "point," this must be reckoned the most interesting performance of the week, and it reflected much credit on the honorary conductor of the Society, Mr. G. H. Hirst. The principals were Miss Florence Monk, Miss Jeanie Rankin, Mr. Tom Child, and Mr. David Hughes. On the following evening the Leeds Philharmonic Society had its turn. This Society, under the late Mr. Alfred Broughton's rule, was the first in the West Riding to adopt the Franz score, and it was used on this occasion for the third time. Mr. Beyschlag, Mr. Broughton's successor, conducted ably, but seems as yet to be hardly thoroughly at home in Handel's music. That he has, however, acquired some of the English traditions concerning the reading of "The Messiah" was shown by his adherence to certain time-honoured pianos, introduced more for the sake of contrast (as in "The Kingdom of this world") than for purposes of genuine expression. The soloists were Madame Albani, Miss Sarah Berry, and Messrs. Herbert Grover and Watkin Mills, of whom the contralto and bass especially distinguished themselves. Refinement and intelligence characterised the chorus-singing of the Halifax Society on December 19. Mr. W. H. Garland is at his best as a chorusmaster, and the fruits of his labours were very apparent. The soloists were Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Lilian Hovey, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. The Huddersfield chorus is second to none in the West Riding for robust strength. They are heard to the greatest advantage in music as old and familiar as "The Messiah," and nothing in its way could be finer than the manner in which they sing the massive choruses in that work. In other respects the Society's performance, on December 20, was less remarkable, the inferiority of the band being the more striking owing to the precision and power of the chorus-singing. Here, however, as at Dewsbury and Halifax, the really admirable trumpet playing of Mr. Tomlinson, a Leeds musician, deserves a word of strong praise. With many better known artists in our recollection, not one is there who can play the obbligato to "The trumpet shall sound" more perfectly. It should be added that Mr. John Bowling conducts the Huddersfield Society. On the whole, then, these five performances we have been considering showed a welcome advance in the greater attention to points of detail that are too often neglected, and in an increased reverence for Handel's presumable intentions. What is still wanted is that our conductors should endeavour to get behind the stupid traditions that have gradually become encrusted upon the oratorio, until they have come to be regarded as authentic.

One more "Messiah" Concert, that of the Malton Choral Society, deserves a line, if only on account of the gem of musical criticism it brought forth in a local paper. Waxing eloquent over the "orchestration," which is journalese for the playing of an orchestra, the poetic reporter writes: "In the Pastoral Symphony the instrumentalists were heard to special advantage, producing breadth and length of tone, as well as the light and feathery, such as the strings might be expected to yield were they tripped over by fairy feet or brushed by butterflies' wings."

In the way of miscellaneous Concerts there is but little to record. At Leeds the second of Mr. Whitelock's Subscription Concerts took place on December 16, when Miss Frida Scotta's violin playing was the chief feature of the programme, in which Mr. Christensen appeared as pianist-composer, playing a pleasing Sonata of his own composition, and Miss Fanny Neuveldt and Miss José Jacombs as vocalists. At Messrs. Haddock's "Musical Evening," on the 14th ult., there was the popular sensation of a "juvenile phenomenon" in the appearance of the little girl, Katie Leonard, as pianist. Mr. Francia, described as "the greatest mandolinist in the world," was another popular feature, and the list of artists was completed by the violoncellist, Mr. Rubio, and the vocalists, Miss Evangeline Florence, Mr. Guetary, and Mr. Lucien Grey. On December 18 the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society, now approaching near its majority, gave a most interesting miscellaneous Concert, consisting chiefly of concerted vocal music. Mr. J. E. Ibeson conducted, and the vocalists were Miss Dyson, Madame H. Cooke (both members of the Society), and Mr. W. Arnold. The Huddersfield Subscription Concerts were resumed on the 14th ult., when Mr. Leonard Borwick and the Misses Salter gave a thoroughly enjoyable Recital of pianoforte and vocal music. The finished duet-singing by the two ladies deserves particular mention, while of Mr. Borwick it must be said that his playing seemed to realise more than it has hitherto done the poetry and romance of the music. More beautifully finished in every detail it could hardly be. The same three artists took part in the Bradford Subscription Concert of the following Friday (17th ult.), but the scope of the programme was enlarged, and Brahms's Horn Trio and Dvorák's String Quartet in E flat (Op. 51) were included. Lady Hallé, with Messrs. Ries, Gibson, and Becker, were the strings, and Mr. Paersch, the excellent first horn of the Hallé band, took the horn part in the Trio. On the 20th ult. Mr. Frederick Dawson gave a Pianoforte Recital at Bramley, and played an ample selection of modern pianoforte music with irresistible brilliance. Miss Hedwig Kuscher was the vocalist. An interesting series of monthly Organ Recitals is now being given at Bradford, on the large organ built in 1888 by Anneessens, of Belgium, for the Roman Catholic Church of St. Mary. The organist is Mr. J. Herbert England, who has just been appointed organist to St. Thomas's, Leeds. While mentioning organ music, a brief reference may be made to the Wakefield and District Organists' Association, which celebrated last month its sixth anniversary. As a means of bringing the professional musicians of the city and district together, and abating the jealousies with which musical people are credited, it is an institution that might well be imitated in other large towns.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

M. Alphonse Duvernoy's "Hellé" is being actively rehearsed at the Opéra. Before it is brought out here, however, there will be a revival of "La Favorita," with Mdlle. Bréval in the titular part.

Madame Sanderson sang, on December 29, for the first time, and with much success, the part of Gilda, in "Rigoletto," at the above Institution.

At the Opéra Comique rehearsals are going forward of M. Messager's "Chevalier d'Harmenthal." On December 23 last the first performance took place of "La Jacquerie," an opera in four acts, the libretto by M. Edouard Blau and Madame Simond Arnaud, the music by Lalo and M. Arthur Coquard. The first act only is Lalo's; the remaining three reflect great credit upon M. Coquard, who has displayed in them considerable dramatic qualities. The second act and part of the fourth are more particularly remarkable in this respect. His work met with a very favourable reception, both on the part of the public and the musical press.

The Concert du Conservatoire, of December 22, included a fine interpretation of the D major Symphony by Brahms. Sarasate was the solo violinist, and scored a great success by his rendering of Saint-Saëns's third Concerto (first produced at the Salle Erard on February 9, 1881), the Andantino quasi Allegretto coming in for a special share of applause. The Concert of the 12th ult. was chiefly noticeable for the performance of a symphonic ode, entitled "La Mer," by M. Joncières (the poetry from the pen of M. Guinand), with solo, interpreted by Mdlle. Laudi, an excellent vocalist, who obtained a great and well-merited success.

M. Lamoureux, while continuing his superb interpretations of Beethoven's Symphonies, included in the Concert of December 22 the "Defiance of Phœbus and of Pan," by Bach. This grand work—for soli, chorus, and orchestra—had already been given at these Concerts in 1883, the translation having been supplied by the late M. Wilder. Replete as this score is with gaiety and youthful spirit, it forms a distinct contrast to the austere character exhibited by the other great works of the old master. The opening chorus, the air of Pan, as well as that of Midas, were greatly applauded. No performances took place on December 29 and the 5th ult., but a special Concert was given on the 12th, when, however, no new works were produced, with the exception of the "Variations Symphoniques" for pianoforte and orchestra of Franck, capitally played by Madame Jossie.

No novelties were produced by M. Colonne. On December 22 Berlioz's "L'Enfance du Christ" was given, and during the following fortnight no performances took place, M. Colonne taking advantage of the holidays in conducting some Concerts in Russia.

The Concert given at the Opéra, on December 29, on the other hand, included several new works. The first of these, "Temps de Guerre," tableaux symphoniques for orchestra, organ, and double chorus, by M. Le Borne, is a highly creditable composition. The carillon, with its characteristic rhythm, pleased greatly, and had to be repeated. As to the fragment from an opera, "Le Duc de Ferrare," by M. Marty, we have to reiterate the observation made in regard to the "Fervaal" of M. d'Indy: one ought to hear the portion preceding, as well as that following it, in order to be in a position to judge. The great success of the Concert was the production of the "Nuit de Noël de 1870," by M. Pierné, with some verses by M. Morand, very impressively recited by M. Brémond. The scene passes at the outposts; some random shots are exchanged, the contending parties being invisible to each other. Presently a bell heralds in the Midnight Mass; Christmas carols are heard on one side, which are soon responded to by the enemy in similar strains. The music is descriptive, is marked by appropriate colour and emotion, and proved highly effective with the audience.

M. Breitner has instituted a Société Philharmonique, giving some interesting Concerts of chamber music. A noticeable feature in the Concert which took place on December 27 was the first performance of a Sonata (Op. 8) for pianoforte and violin, by M. Chevillard; a somewhat heavy composition, but the work of an earnest musician, and interesting. The performances given by MM. Philipp, Berthelier, and Associates likewise deserve some passing mention. They included recently a Quintet (Op. 126) by Jadassohn, a Trio by Smetana, an Elegie by Glazounow, &c.

The Société de Musique d'Ensemble gave a first hearing of Xaver Scharwenka's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat, played in a remarkably fine manner by the excellent pianist, M. Foerster, who was also greatly applauded in his rendering of the "Valses Sérieuses" of M. René Lenormand.

Madame Patti came over to take part in a performance of "Mirka l'Enchantresse," a pantomime by M. Boyer, the representation having been organised by the committee of the Florian Monument. Needless to say that the financial result was a magnificent one. The feeling of gratitude inspired by the celebrated vocalist's generous co-operation is not unmixed with one of regret at our not having been afforded the opportunity of applauding her in some important musical manifestation.

MM. Sardou and Jules Lemaître have been appointed members of the Comité d'enseignement pour la déclamation dramatique at the Conservatoire, in the room of MM. Camille Doucet and Alexandre Dumas, and M. Henri Lavedan has been nominated a member of the examining committee of classes and of the jury de l'admission.

M. Bourgault-Ducoudry has been continuing his remarkable Lectures at the Salle César Franck, his subject on December 28 having been the "Orfeo" of Monteverde.

MUSIC IN MONTREAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The organisation this season of the Handel and Haydn Society, with a chorus of some 200 members, is direct evidence of the growing popularity of chorus singing in this city. The maiden effort was made before the public on December 12, when very creditable performances of Gounod's "Gallia" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" were given in presence of a fairly large audience. The soloists were Miss Myrta French, Miss Claribel Rayner, and Mr. Evan Williams, a recent arrival from that home of tenors—Wales. Mr. Williams has a fine robust voice and his efforts were fully appreciated. The accompaniments were played by the Montreal Amateur Orchestral Association, assisted by professional musicians. The conductor of the new Society is Mr. Horace W. Reyner. Other Concerts advertised by this Society are "The Messiah" on April 3 (Good Friday), and April 14, Henschel's "Stabat Mater," conducted by the composer, with Mrs. Henschel as soloist.

Another Society which is destined to do much toward propagating the love of music in Montreal is the Ladies' Morning Musical Club, organised a couple of years ago. Twice a month, on Thursday mornings, the members meet, when a programme of pianoforte solos and duets, songs and choruses is given. The Club numbers some 300 members, and applicants now have to wait some time for admission.

On Thursday, December 12, an open Concert was given and a very enjoyable programme provided. The chorus sang Soderman's Wedding March, Hatton's "Summer Eve," and Brahms's "Cradle Song," under the bâton of Mr. C. A. E. Harriss. The pièce de resistance of the Concert was Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto, played by Miss Herchmer, with accompaniment on another pianoforte by Mrs. Stanway.

Notwithstanding this formidable array of popular attractions the Philharmonic Society, now in its nineteenth season, continues to grow in popularity. This is due to earnest and successful efforts to produce the finest choral works of old and modern writers in a worthy manner. The chorus numbers 317 members, and is composed of many of the best singers in the city. The twelfth performance of "The Messiah," on December 20, was a noble one. The choruses have never been sung here with such accuracy and colour, and the vast audience was enthusiastic. Miss Louise M. Daly, a local soprano, who sang in the work for the first time, acquitted herself with great credit. The contralto was Mrs. Van der Veer Green; the tenor, Mr. D. G. Henderson; and the bass, Mr. Marshall Williams, also a local singer, who rendered his solos in excellent taste. The Philharmonic Society has a heavy programme before it, as the following list of Concerts will testify: 11th inst., Haydn's "Creation"; March 31, Mendelssohn's "Elijah"; April 1, Gounod's "Redemption"; April 27, 28, and 29, Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah," Chadwick's "Lily Nymph" (composed for, and dedicated to, the Society), Wagner's "Tannhäuser," and a Matinée of orchestral numbers and vocal solos.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

The present season of grand opera in New York is remarkable in the immense range which is being covered by the management, if for no other reason. From Gluck's "Orfeo" all the way round to Massenet's "Navarraise" the lover of opera of every sort and shade can find something to his taste. The Wagnerian works so far brought out under Mr. Seidl's direction have proved somewhat uneven in performance, some of the casts having been much better than others. In fact, a certain inequality has characterised all the season's work, for what reason it is difficult to say, with such a very large and strong company. There seems to be a tendency to bring forward all the stars of greater magnitude at once, and as they cannot appear at all the performances, the alternate ones, when the lesser lights of the company are permitted to shine in leading rôles, are hardly up to the mark. Nevertheless, it is probable that there would be no cause for complaint were it not that the best representations of opera are really so brilliant that the others seem indifferent by comparison, though, under other circumstances, they would be considered entirely satisfactory.

Among other new departures, the managers of the Metropolitan have quite altered the character of the Sunday night "Sacred Concerts" which the orchestra and soloists of the company have given during each season. Until the present time these have always consisted of orchestral works with solos (generally pretty hackneyed ones too), with an occasional semi-sacred chorus given by voices all selected from the regular members of the company. Rossini's "Stabat Mater" very often did duty as the pièce de resistance at these affairs, which were to all intents and purposes secular, just enough of the sacred element being introduced to make good the advance announcements. This year the expedient has been tried of giving oratorio on Sunday nights, the opera chorus being supplanted by voices taken from some of the singing societies of New York and Brooklyn. Up to the time of writing no very great success has been scored in this way. A performance of "The Messiah" was very much worse than indifferent, the chorus being under no sort of proper control, and, being made up from different organisations, had no unanimity or similarity of training.

Speaking of "The Messiah," however, reminds one that the New York Oratorio Society gave this year what was by a long way the best rendering of that oratorio that it has ever accomplished. During the absence of Mr. Walter Damrosch, who is in the West with his German Opera Company, the Oratorio Society has been under the direction of his brother, Mr. Frank Damrosch. Long ago Walter Damrosch caused a good deal of comment by his departure from established tempi in the Allegro movements of "The Messiah," but his high rates of speed won popular favour, after the public had grown accustomed to them, and for years the conductor's ideas have set the fashion for other chorus-leaders about New York. This year, under the bâton of their new leader, the chorus fairly eclipsed all the previous records in speed; but lest it should seem that this was merely an attempt at a feat, it should be said that, though the members of the chorus sang their difficult roulades at a fairly breathless rate, everything was done with the utmost neatness, lightness, and precision, and the effect upon the audience was electric. In fact, the entire performance was distinctly notable, and may be set down as one of the very best ever given in this country.

It was very unfortunate that after such a performance as this, and while it was still "town talk," so to speak, the New Harlem Oratorio Society, which was brought together last fall under the direction of Mr. Samuel A. Baldwin, should have made its entrance into the field with "The Messiah." At its Concert on the 7th ult., at Carnegie Hall, the new choir turned out a chorus of from 150 to 175 voices. Fortunately for the conductor, he had engaged the Damrosch orchestra and the New York Society's organist. Had it not been for this the result might have been more disastrous than it was. At the very outset it was apparent that the chorus were insufficiently prepared, and that they were much hampered by the fact that they were spread out along a series of seats intended to accommodate a chorus of 300 or 350 persons. The extreme wings being so far from each other, there was a most lamentable swaying and unsteadiness about the whole body. This the conductor was powerless to control, but the orchestra saved the day, playing together with remarkable dash and swing (considering the circumstances), and fairly lifting the chorus "over the stile" at many points. Since the abandonment of the field by the Church Choral Society there are but three choirs of the smaller size that are doing oratorio work in New York, and of these two devote quite as much attention to secular as to sacred compositions, so that there is an excellent opportunity for an organisation of this kind which will stick to oratorio and do really good work, and it is to be hoped that the Harlem Society will step into the place which seems open to it.

In Brooklyn the Oratorio Club gave an excellent Concert on the evening of December 26, when Mr. Dudley Buck's "Golden Legend" was sung, the composer conducting. Mendelssohn's "Loreley" music formed the second part of the Concert, and this was given under the bâton of Mr. Walter H. Hall, the chorus-master of the Club.

During Advent, the choir of Calvary Church rendered Spohr's "Last Judgment" in the thoroughly finished way which always characterises the work of Mr. Clement R. Gale, the organist of that church; and on the evening of the last Sunday in December "The Messiah" (considerably abbreviated) was sung by the choir of St. James's Church, under the direction of Mr. Alfred S. Baker. This choir, which now contains the best of the voices from the Church of the Holy Trinity, which consolidated with St. James's in November last, is now one of the largest and best equipped in the city, having about thirty boys and twenty men, including a double quartet of soloists.

The monthly "Festival Services," which for years have been a great feature in the church music of New York, have fallen off greatly both in numbers and importance during the past year. The churches seem to have grown tired of them.

THE Philharmonic Society's eighty-fourth season, which commences on the 27th inst., promises to be more than usually brilliant and interesting. Among the novelties announced are orchestral works by Dvorák, Borodine's Symphony (No. 1) in E flat, a Ballet Suite by Mr. Cowen, a new Violin Concerto composed by the late Benjamin Godard for M. Johannes Wolff, and Sir A. C. Mackenzie's Scottish Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra, written for M. Paderewski. Mr. Cowen's Suite, which will probably be entitled "Fairyland," contains six movements, respectively headed "Wood Nymphs," "March of the Giants," "Flower Fairies," "Dance of Gnomes," "Moonbeam Fairies," and "Dance of Witches." The artists engaged include Madame Sophie Menter, Messrs. d'Albert, Reisenauer, Rosenthal, Sapellnikoff, and Paderewski; Messrs. Johannes Wolff, John Dunn, and Franz Ondricek; Mesdames Sembrich, Amy Sherwin, Esther Palliser, the Sisters Ravogli, and Mr. Bispham. Herr Dvorák and Mr. Cowen will conduct their own works, and the director in chief will, of course, be Sir A. C. Mackenzie.

A CONCERT was given at the Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 21st ult., by the Grimson Family of Instrumentalists. The performance of Mendelssohn's String Octet, by Mr. S. Dean Grimson, his four daughters, and three sons, was evidently intended to be the feature of the Concert, for it was proudly, and no doubt correctly, described as the "first performance in London by members of one family." The work exactly suited the clever players, who performed it with much spirit and finish. Brahms's F minor Pianoforte Quintet is at present outside their reach, and it was, perhaps, a mistake to attempt it. Miss Jessie Grimson, the "leader," played Kufferath's Andante expressively and effectively. Misses Amy and Annie were heard to considerable advantage in some pianoforte solos, and Master Robert showed promise as a violoncellist.

PROFESSOR E. H. TURPIN, Warden of Trinity College, London, presented the diplomas and certificates to the students in the hall of the College, Manchester Square, on the 15th ult. It appeared that for this—the January—examination there were 215 entries, the highest number ever reached at a similar half-year's examination, that 187 presented themselves at the College, and seventy-five passed. Of the above-named total, twenty-eight were examined at Sydney, Melbourne, and Ballarat, the results not being yet known. Ten students gained the distinction of Associates in Music, and two Licentiates, these being the highest awards of the College, and the students must have passed an examination in general subjects as well.

DR. J. M. ENNIS gave a Chamber Music Concert on the 16th ult., at St. Mary Brookfield Parish Hall. Dr. Ennis played Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in F minor (Op. 57), and, with Mrs. Ennis (violin), Mr. Lennox Clayton (viola), and Mr. W. H. Pettit (violoncello), Rheinberger's Quartet in E flat (Op. 38) for pianoforte and strings, and also Mozart's Quartet in G minor. Mrs. Ennis played the slow movement from Max Bruch's Violin Concerto (Op. 26), and classical songs, rendered by Miss Gertrude Snow and Mr. Eben Eade, completed the programme.

HAYDN'S "Creation" was performed on the 16th ult., at Highbury Quadrant Congregational Church. The soloists were Miss Emily Davies (who was specially successful), Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. George Stubbs. Mr. E. Drewett was at the organ, and Miss Alice Dearden assisted at the pianoforte. The orchestra and chorus, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Briscoe (the organist and musical director of the church), were efficient. Mr. Briscoe will give his first annual Concert on the 11th inst.

THE Nonconformist Choir Union Festival at the Crystal Palace will be held on June 13. The pieces selected to be sung by the choir are the 13th Psalm (Mendelssohn), "Let the righteous be glad" (F. R. Lloyd), "All Thy works praise Thee" (A. Briscoe), "Blessed are the merciful" (G. Rayleigh Vicars), "I heard the voice of Jesus say" (E. Minshall), "Whilst youthful sports" (J. Barnby), "Softly the moonlight" (F. Iliffe), "The West Wind" (W. McKendrick), "O'er the woodland chace" (H. W. Wareing), and "Full fathom five" (C. Wood).

SIR ARTHUR SULLIVAN, speaking recently of the Clinton Combination Clarinet, said that the combination of the A natural and B flat clarinets in one instrument would not only be an economy to the individual player, the orchestral society, or band committee, but artistically would be an immense boon to the composers and those who score for the orchestra or military band, bringing as it would an infinitely greater variety of music than hitherto within the scope of performance, and immensely enhancing the effect of the important clarinet parts.

Mdlle. Katti de Noël, a young American vocalist, who made her first appearance in London on the 14th ult., at a Concert given by herself in St. James's Hall, has much to learn before she can hope to gain an esteemed position in the metropolis. Mdlle. Noël, however, has a sympathetic voice, which might become more powerful with further training. The other vocalists were Miss Florence Oliver, Miss Clara Butt, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Thorndike, and Mr. Santley.

Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was sung, with full orchestra, at St. Patrick's Church, Soho, on the 19th ult. Master Turnbull Sinclair gave a beautiful rendering of the soprano solos, his singing of the "Inflammatus" in particular being very artistic. The tenor solos were sung by Mr. Pearson, who was heard to excellent effect in the "Cujus animam" and the quartet "Quando corpus." Mr. Cassidy, organist of the church, conducted.

A series of Organ Recitals is now being given by Dr. C. J. Frost at the Goldsmiths' Institute, New Cross, on Thursdays, at 6.30, each programme consisting of the works of one composer. The composers represented during the past month have been Gustav Merkel, Charles E. Stephens, and J. S. Bach; and during the present month works by Baptiste Calkin, Fillipo Capocci, W. T. Best, and Charles Marie Widor will be given.

An excellent Concert was given, on the 16th ult., at Roehampton Schools, before a large and select audience. Songs were rendered by Miss G. Hughes, Miss K. Connell, whose singing was much admired; Miss R. Williams, Mr. G. Hoare, and Mr. M. Tufnail. Others who took part were Miss E. Reynolds (violin), Miss L. Brown (pianoforte), Miss M. Rowsell (elocutionist), and Mr. G. Schneider (humorist). Mr. P. Correlli accompanied.

A successful Concert was given, on the 17th ult., at the British Embassy, Brussels, in aid of the British Institute. Several gifted artists, including the talented young violoncellist, M. Marix Loevensohn, and a ladies' choir, rendered valuable assistance. Much interest was shown in the performance of some vocal compositions by Mrs. Mary Augusta Salmond, a pupil of the late Sir George Macfarren.

The members of the choir of St. Mark's Church, Battersea Rise, gave a Concert at the St. Mark's Vestry Hall, on the 22nd ult., under the able direction of Mr. Herbert Bray. Several choruses and part-songs were efficiently sung, and instrumental solos were contributed by Miss Grace Henshaw (pianoforte) and Mr. Frederik Frederiksen (violin), whose efforts were much appreciated.

The next Lecture at the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts will be of special musical interest, Mr. H. F. Frost having selected as his subject "The art work of Richard Wagner," with musical illustrations, in which he will be assisted by Miss Beatrice Frost, Mr. G. R. Betjemann, and Mr. J. S. Shedlock. The chair will be occupied by Mr. E. F. Jacques.

The annual series of Chamber Concerts of the Musical Artists' Society will be given at St. Martin's Town Hall, on March 16, April 27, May 11, and June 15. The Council appointed for 1896 consists of Messrs. Walter Macfarren, Algernon Ashton, W. H. Speer, Alfred Gilbert, F. J. Simpson, Henry C. Banister, Sidney R. Cole, G. W. Hammond, and Miss Oliveria Prescott.

At St. Alban's, Holborn, on the 21st ult., an excellent rendering of the new Christmas cantata "The Holy Child" (Adams) was given by the choir, preceded by an Organ Recital by Mr. Thomas Adams, organist of the church. The Offertory was devoted towards defraying the debt on the splendid instrument recently erected by Messrs. Henry Willis and Son.

Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be performed at the Crystal Palace, on the afternoon of Saturday, June 27, in celebration of the jubilee of the first production of the oratorio. Madame Albani, Miss Clara Butt, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley will sing the principal solo parts. Mr. August Manns will, of course, conduct; Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock presiding at the organ.

At the recent examinations at the Royal College of Organists, there were 166 candidates for the Associateship, forty of whom passed; and 103 candidates for Fellowship, twenty-seven of whom passed.

At the Intermediate Examinations in Music at the University of London, the following satisfied the examiners:—First division, Percy Bright (Royal College of Music); second division, Edward Alphonsus Maginty; and at the Intermediate D.Mus. Examination, Charles Stanley Parsonson and Percy Rodney Rideout passed.

At St. Simon's, Upper Chelsea, a successful Carol Service (with orchestra) was held on the Feast of the Epiphany (6th ult.). The special soloists were Mr. G. E. Johnson and Mr. R. Fitzgerald. Mr. G. Hardcastle (of St. Peter's, Hoxton) presided at the organ, and Mr. Thomas Curry conducted.

Handel's "Hercules" will be performed on Saturday evening, the 8th inst., at the People's Palace, by the Handel Society, under its new conductor, Mr. J. S. Liddle. Professor Prout has kindly undertaken to fill in the accompaniments from the figured bass on the pianoforte in the airs and recitatives.

On the 8th ult. a performance of "The Messiah" was given by the Kyrle Choir, in St. Chrysostom's Church, Peckham, the soloists being Mrs. Stanesby, Miss Marion Arber, Mr. Herbert Clinch, and Mr. H. Chilver Wilson. Dr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ.

A selection of carols was given at St. Paul's, Covent Garden, on the 12th ult., at the conclusion of the evening service, under the direction of Mr. Philip Macdonald (organist of the church). The solos were sung by Master Harding and Mr. Samuel Masters.

The fourteenth series of Concerts of chamber music by the Musical Guild will be given in the Town Hall, Kensington, on Tuesdays, the 4th and 18th inst., March 3 and 17.

Mr. Walter Alcock will give a series of Organ Recitals in Holy Trinity Church, Sloane Street, on Saturdays, at 5 o'clock, commencing to-day.

OBITUARY.

In Lady Llanover, whose death, at the mature age of ninety-four, was announced on the 17th ult., art, music, and literature in Wales have lost a most active and influential patroness. She revived the ancient glories of the Eisteddfod, and herself carried off a prize for a Welsh essay at the Meeting held at Cardiff in 1834. One of her most earnest desires was to maintain a national school of music in the Principality, and with that end in view she brought out, in conjunction with Miss Jane Williams, of Aberpergwym, a collection of Welsh airs. Perceiving, moreover, the neglect into which the chief characteristic musical instrument of the country—the three-stringed harp—had fallen, and recognising its national significance, she asserted her influence in every possible way in order to revive its use.

The death is announced, recently, at Antwerp, of M. Alphonse Lemaire, for many years the distinguished conductor of the Société Royale d'Harmonie in that town. Born at Namur, in 1811, Lemaire, when still quite a young man, became associated with several French provincial theatres in the capacity of orchestral conductor, and ultimately obtained the post of conductor and artistic director at the Royal Theatre, Antwerp. Here he soon became a chief leader in musical matters. He interested himself in the development of choral singing, and under his direction the "Echo de l'Escaut" was raised to the foremost rank amongst Belgian choirs. As conductor of the Société d'Harmonie, the Concerts organised by Lemaire during a period of some thirty years formed one of the principal musical attractions of Antwerp. Most of the celebrated artists of the day appeared in them, and invariably expressed their delight at the masterly accompaniment of the orchestra, a department in the art of conducting in which Lemaire had few equals. The deceased, who had resigned his professional appointments some years since, was a man of culture, an excellent raconteur in connection with the reminiscences of a lengthy artistic career, and his personality will be greatly missed in Antwerp musical circles.

The death is announced, on December 18, at The Hague, of Wilhelmine Gips, a vocalist of considerable reputation. She was born at Dordrecht in 1843, and being gifted with an excellent soprano voice, of a most sympathetic timbre, she studied under C. Schneider and Hill, and in 1869 under Madame Viardot-Garcia, at Baden-Baden. Soon after she made her début in one of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts, and other German Concert-rooms, with the greatest success. After some extensive Concert tours, in the course of which she also visited England, she returned to her native Holland, where she frequently took a leading part in musical Festivals and Concerts, but retired into private life at a comparatively early period on account of her delicate health. Her singing was, perhaps, most admired in oratorio; but she was also much esteemed as an interpreter of Lieder, more particularly those of Schumann.

On December 20 last there died at Leipzig, at the mature age of eighty-two, Johann David Wünsch, the founder of the firm of musical instrument makers of that name. The deceased, originally a simple stocking weaver by trade, had educated himself into an excellent musician, and for a period of twelve years, from 1847 to 1860, occupied the post of a contra-bassist in the orchestras of the Leipzig Theatre and of the Gewandhaus, he having been in this humble capacity associated with Mendelssohn, Schumann, Gade, and other conductors of the Gewandhaus Concerts of less celebrity. Wünsch's name is also connected with the concertina, in the construction of which instrument he devised some important improvements.

Frau Friederike Streicher, née Müller, died on December 12, at Vienna. She was the widow of J. B. Streicher, the celebrated Viennese pianoforte maker, whose father was the friend, from boyhood, of Schiller, and whose mother could claim friendship with Beethoven. Friederike Streicher, in her younger days, was a celebrated pianist and a pupil of Chopin. She was in her eightieth year.

Johann Nepomuk Kral, the excellent military bandmaster, died on the 1st ult., at Tulln, near Vienna, at the age of seventy-nine. He was a great favourite with the Viennese public, his popularity being equal to that of Czibulka and Komzák. His numerous valses and marches have enjoyed great vogue in their day, his "Hoch Hapsburg" still remaining one of the most popular marches with the Austrian army.

The highly esteemed town organist of Reichenberg, Herr Robert Ludwig Proksch, died last month in that town, at the age of forty-eight. The scion of a family of organists, the deceased was a pupil of his father, and of Albrecht, in Zittau. Upon the death, in 1866, of his father, he succeeded the latter in the organistship at the Archidiaconal Church in Reichenberg, where he was also the director of the Musical Institute, rendering distinguished service to the cultivation of church music in that town. In an access of mental derangement the deceased terminated his own existence.

The death occurred recently, at Brussels, of Franz de Mol, composer, conductor, and organist at the churches of Notre Dame de la Chapelle and Notre Dame de Bon Secours. The deceased belonged to a musical family, his three brothers (two of whom preceded him in death) having likewise attained some distinction in the profession; notably F. M. de Mol, whose opera, "Le Chanteur de Medine," was successfully produced some years since at the Théâtre de la Monnaie. He was only thirty-four years of age.

Baron Achille Paganini, the only son of the famous violinist, died recently at his villa, near Parma. He was a man of considerable wealth, for, besides the property at the Villa Guiona, he inherited from his father a fortune of some eighty thousand pounds. Baron Achille was an amateur musician, but he never adopted the art as a profession.

The death is announced, recently, at Wiesbaden, at the age of sixty-eight, of Herr Conrad Joseph Fischer, the eminent violinist and teacher. Among his pupils was Herr Wilhelmj.

We have also to record the following deaths:—

On December 6, at Frankfort-on-Main, F. C. Edler, noted violin maker, and connoisseur of old Italian instruments, aged forty-four.

On December 16, at Wohlhausen, Friedrich Albin Graupner, well known musical instrument maker.

On December 20, at Portici, Melchiorre Delfico, musician and caricaturist, composer of several more or less successful operettas, aged seventy.

Recently, at Leipzig, Friedrich Trinckler, president of the Leipzig Liedertafel, and promoter of other choral societies, greatly esteemed in musical circles, aged sixty-one.

On December 23, at Prague, F. Chlum, musical instructor at the Christian Academy, zealous promoter of Catholic Church music, aged forty-seven.

On December 25, at Posen, musik-director Paul Stiller, conductor of the Allgemein-Maennere Gesangverein and the Sängerbund of the Province of Posen, successful composer of male choruses, aged fifty-four.

Recently, at Rochester (New York), Rev. M. Kuborn, father of the Convent of the Redemption, earnest promoter of church music.

Recently, at New York, Henry Widmer, conductor of Daly's Theatre, and music publisher, aged fifty.

On December 29, at Vienna, Ludwig Klemcke, distinguished oboe player.

On December 30, at Frankfork-on-Main, Hermann Matthias, esteemed vocal teacher, formerly of the Royal Opera, Dresden.

Recently, at Rome, Ercole Ovidi, musician and journalist, composer of the fairy operas "Befana" and "Re Maccarone," which met with but little success.

Recently, at Buda Pesth, Willy Deutsch, pianist of note.

On the 13th ult., at Vienna, Sofie Wlczek, vocalist, for many years of the Carlsruhe Hof-Theater, and, since 1880, member of the teaching staff of the Viennese Conservatorium, aged seventy-one.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MADAME BLAVATSKY AS A PIANIST.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In Colonel Olcott's recently published book, "Old Diary Leaves," which is really an account of Madame Blavatsky and the Theosophical Society, occurs a passage which may be of interest to your readers. Perhaps one of them may be able to prove or disprove its accuracy. On page 458 Colonel Olcott, speaking of Madame Blavatsky, says: "She was a splendid pianist, playing with a touch and expression that were simply superb. Her hands were models—ideal and actual—for a sculptor, and never seen to such advantage as when flying over the keyboard to find its magical melodies. She was a pupil of Moscheles, and when in London as a young girl, with her father, played at a charity Concert with Madame Clara Schumann and Madame Arabella Goddard in a piece of Schumann's for three pianos." To this Colonel Olcott adds a note to the effect that at one time Madame Blavatsky had made Concert tours in Italy and Russia, under the pseudonym of "Madame Laura," in the early seventies. He goes on to say that her playing was best when she was "occupied" by a Mahâtma (of course!), and improvised so that one might think oneself listening to the Gandhâvas or heavenly choristers. Can any trace be found of this charity Concert? Does Madame Schumann perhaps remember it? Madame Blavatsky's maiden name was Hahn. If I had Siddhi and were a Guru I should know without asking, and should not trouble you; but I am not even a chela—I am only a Reviewer.

London, January, 1896.

P.S.—Would you allow a Mahâtma to "precipitate" an answer into your columns?

FOREIGN TITLES FOR ENGLISH WORKS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In your kind notice of my Suite, played by the Stock Exchange Orchestra at its last Concert, you discover an affectation in my use of French to describe the work. Critics seem to have been much exercised in mind lately by the titles that composers have thought fit to give their works. The same charge of affectation was made quite recently against an English composer for attaching to his Symphony a German quotation, whilst another unfortunate was taken to task for calling an orchestral piece of his an Overture. With regard to myself, may I say that I did not use the French language in any spirit of affectation, but because "Suite," being really a French word, "Petite Suite" seemed to me more euphonious than "Little Suite" or "Small Suite," and having got so far I thought it as well to have the rest of the title in French, and so added "pour orchestre."

I am, Sir, your obedient Servant,
Richard H. Walthew.

Highbury, January 2, 1896.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Andover.—Mr. Arthur C. Bennett gave his fifth annual Concert on the 14th ult., in the Town Hall, before a large audience. The vocalists were Miss Katie Thomas, Miss Nellie Edwards, and Mr. David Jones. Some violoncello solos were contributed by Mr. Prosper Burnett, and Mr. Bennett's pupils played Handel's Overture to "Samson," Haydn's Symphony in C (No. 1), Bach's Air and Gavotte from the Suite in D, and several other pieces.

Bangor.—On December 27, at St. Mary's Church, a performance of "The Messiah" (Part 1), with the "Hallelujah" chorus added, was given by the combined choirs of the church, about sixty voices, assisted by an orchestra, led by Miss Isabel Hewitt. The soloists were Miss M. E. Williams, Miss W. Parsons, Mr. W. Jones, and Mr. W. Roberts. The Cathedral organist, Mr. T. Westlake Morgan, presided at the organ, and Mr. Owen Pryce, the organist and choirmaster of the church, conducted.

Blaina, Monmouthshire.—The English Congregational Church Choir gave its tenth annual Oratorio Concert, at the New Wesleyan Chapel, on New Year's Day, when Handel's "Messiah" was very creditably rendered. The chorus numbered about 100, and the principal soloists were the Misses S. A. Jenkins and C. H. Jones, Messrs. H. Williams and T. Hughes. The accompaniments were played by an efficient orchestra under the leadership of Professor W. F. Hulley, and by Mr. D. Williams at the organ. The Rev. David Williams conducted.

Brighton.—A Concert of more than usual artistic importance was given on the 18th ult., in the Dome, by Mr. Alberto Randegger's excellent orchestra of the London Queen's Hall. Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, Mendelssohn's third Symphony in A minor, and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi" were the chief works performed, and the vocalist was Miss Clara Butt.

Canterbury.—"The Messiah" was sung in the Cathedral on December 30, under the conductorship of Dr. Longhurst, with Mr. J. S. Grundy at the organ. The solo parts were effectively rendered by Masters Hessenauer and Butcher, and Messrs. J. Plant, Grundy, and Dewhurst.

Crieff.—The Musical Association gave, on December 27, in the Porteous Hall, a performance of "The Messiah," which had many meritorious features. The soloists engaged were Miss M. Finlay, Miss M. W. Fyffe, Mr. P. Kerr, and Mr. J. Fleming. The choral numbers were sung by about 100 voices; Mr. R. P. McGlynn was principal violinist, Mr. M. Dobinson presided at the organ, and Miss M. A. Clark at the pianoforte. Mr. A. Steven conducted with his usual skill.

Dundee.—On the 10th ult. a Chamber Concert was given by Mr. W. P. Fleming, who was successful in pianoforte solos by Chopin and Schumann. He was ably assisted by the Misses Salter (vocalists) and Miss Pearson (violinist).——The fourth Meeting of the Dundee Society of Musicians was held on the 11th ult., when a Lecture was given by Herr Gaertner on "The Classical and Romantic in Art." There were musical illustrations by the lecturer and Mr. J. T. Pye.—Messrs. Paterson, Sons and Co. have again organised a series of four Scottish Orchestral Concerts. The second of these took place on December 27, under the conductorship of Mr. Kes.

Evesham.—An effective performance of "The Messiah" was given on the 1st ult., in the All Saints' Church, under the conductorship of Mr. Robert Taylor. The soloists were Miss G. Smith, Miss M. Taylor, Mr. G. Blandford, and Mr. F. Marston. The chorus consisted of about seventy voices, and Mr. E. West received able assistance at the organ from a small orchestra.

Exeter.—A musical Service was held in St. James's Church on December 29 and the 3rd ult., under the direction of Mr. Edwin N. Tayler, organist and choirmaster. The vocalist was Mr. E. J. Harding, and the violoncellist Mr. George J. Rudd.——Miss Kitty Althaus, violinist, gave a Chamber Concert, on the 17th ult., in the Public Rooms. The programme included Beethoven's Septet, which was played by the Misses K. Althaus, D. Birkmyer, and R. G. Watson; and Messrs. Dalwood, Atkins, Bayman, and the Rev. E. Capel-Cure. Violin and pianoforte solos, the latter given by Herr Althaus, and some songs by Miss M. Henderson completed a commendable programme.

Leytonstone.—The first Concert of the fourteenth season of the Choral Society was given in the Elliott Rooms, on the 13th ult., when an excellent programme was provided, consisting of part-songs and madrigals by eminent composers. The soloists were Miss Williams and Mr. D. St. Aubyn. A trio for mandolines was played by Miss Cooper and the Misses Isa and Nellie Dick. Miss Akers proved an efficient accompanist, and Mr. J. W. Ullyett conducted.

Madeley, Shropshire.—The Choral Society's annual performance of the twentieth season took place in the Anstice Memorial Institute, before a large audience, on December 31, when "Elijah" was given by a band and chorus of ninety. The principal vocalists were Miss M. Eaton, Miss M. Hackett, Mr. W. Molineaux, and Mr. W. J. Ineson; Mr. T. Watkiss was the principal violin, and Mr. Smart conducted, as usual. The feature of the performance was the excellent chorus singing.

Newport, Shropshire.—In place of the usual Carol Services, Adams's new work, "The Holy Child," an appropriate and easy cantata for the Christmas season, was well performed on Christmas night in the Parish Church.

Parkgate.—The Rawmarsh and Parkgate Harmonic Society gave its twenty-first annual performance of Handel's "Messiah" on December 26, in the United Methodist Free Church. The principals were Miss M. Jacques, Miss Whitehead, Mr. H. Stansfield, and Mr. J. Lycett. Mr. J. A. Cox was the principal violinist, Mr. G. A. Nixon presided at the organ, and Mr. C. Mullins conducted.

Port Elizabeth, Cape of Good Hope.—A praiseworthy performance of selections from "The Messiah" was given on December 24, at the Town Hall, under the able conductorship of Mr. Percival Quarterman, who had brought together some sixty picked vocalists, by whom the choral numbers were effectively sung. The soloists engaged were Mrs. P. Paton, Mrs. T. W. Gibbons, Mr. J. Crichton-Steven, and Mr. T. J. Esterling; Mrs. Quarterman presided with her usual skill at the pianoforte, and Mr. A. Faehse was the principal violin of a capable orchestra.

Rhyl.—Mr. C. Sydney Vinning, who was appointed organist and choirmaster of the well-known fine Church of St. Thomas last May, has just completed a series of twelve Organ Recitals in that church, which have been attended by large congregations. Since his appointment he has greatly interested himself in the music of the town, having re-organised the Choral Society and taken an active part in the Orchestral Society.

Ryde.—The Musical Society, conducted by Mr. Godfrey Luard, gave its first Concert on the 16th ult., when the programme consisted of "Elijah." The principal soloists were Miss Nicholes, Madame K. Lee, Mr. M. Jackson, and Mr. Watkin Mills; and the band was principally composed of members of the Royal Marine Artillery Band.

Sutton.—Mr. H. Francis Gregg gave his annual Concert at the Public Hall, on the 3rd ult., when the hall was crowded. Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Quartet in B minor (Op. 3) was ably interpreted by Mr. Gregg and Messrs. R. and H. Symes and S. Price. Miss Janet Spicer gave Saint-Saëns's "Softly awakes my heart," from "Samson and Delilah," with admirable feeling and declamation; Master Albert Parry gave a charming rendering of Dr. Arne's "Where the bee sucks" and "Cherry Ripe"; Mr. Gregg chose for his solo Liszt's Concert Study in D flat, and gave as an encore Chopin's C minor Prelude; Tours's Duo Symphonique for two violins with pianoforte accompaniment was brilliantly executed by the youthful Miss H. Inglis and Master Roy Forster, as was also Liszt's showy "Galop Chromatique à quatre mains" by Mr. Gregg and his pupil, Mrs. Inglis; recitations were given with much success by Mr. Theodore Gregg, and a violin solo by Mr. R. Symes, and Papini's "Saltarello" by Miss H. Inglis. Songs by Messrs. J. Illington, E. Cristall, L. and G. Pilditch, and V. Bromage were also contained in the programme.

Torquay.—On the 16th ult., at Upon Parish Church (St. Mary Magdalene), an Organ Recital was given before a large congregation by Dr. Varley Roberts, organist of Magdalen College, Oxford.

Workington.—The twenty-first "Ivander" Eisteddfod was held in the Mission Hall, Duke Street, on New Year's Day, the proceedings being closed by a miscellaneous Concert in the evening, in which Miss F. de Boufflers, Mr. C. Archer, Mr. W. H. Cradock, Mr. H. Packer, and Mr. A. L. Packer took part.

THE SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.

GRADUATED EXERCISES FOR ELEMENTARY CLASSES IN BOTH NOTATIONS.

In the October issue of The School Music Review a series of graduated exercises in both notations was commenced. These exercises will be adapted for use in school and other classes beginning an Autumn course. They will provide not only easy sight singing studies to be done in the class room, but exercises suitable for home study. With blackboard work and an educational method of teaching songs, they will probably suffice for the needs of many school classes, or they will usefully supplement a regular class book.

School songs in both notations, and studies and tests of a more advanced character, will also be given as heretofore in the music section.

LESSONS ON INTERVALS AND THEIR NOMENCLATURE.

The identification and nomenclature of intervals is one of the difficulties of elementary musical theory.

With a view to assist Teachers and Students, a set of plain lessons upon this topic was commenced in the October issue of The School Music Review.

The system of naming recommended by the Education Department, the Royal Academy of Music, Trinity College, &c., will be used.

Copies of the October and November numbers may be obtained of the Publishers.

"The work is well laid out, very melodious, and by no means difficult."—Musical News.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S

PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed, the work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul have to be con gratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively—'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' The style of the composition resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguishes itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City,' and other of the composer's works. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for the author's lyrics; the tunes selected are from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will, undoubtedly, greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

THE CRUCIFIXION
A MEDITATION
ON THE
Sacred Passion of the Holy Redeemer
THE WORDS SELECTED AND WRITTEN BY THE
REV. W. J. SPARROW-SIMPSON, M.A.
SET TO MUSIC BY
J. STAINER.

This Work is an attempt to supply the want long felt of an easy and short form of Passion Music suitable for use in ordinary Parish Churches. It is composed for two solo voices, a Tenor and a Bass, and for the church choir. At intervals hymns occur, in which the whole congregation can join. The performance will probably not extend over forty minutes in duration, thus giving an opportunity for a suitable "address" if thought advisable. No orchestra is required, the accompaniments being specially adapted for the organ only; much of the expense usually attending Passion Services will therefore be avoided. The book of the words, for distribution among the congregation, contains the music of the Hymns; by this means it is hoped that the congregation will be induced to take part heartily in the service.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

Thirty-three years have elapsed since the publication of the first English edition, and faithful to its original as that edition may have been in the main, it has been felt that closer adherence to the accepted standard text is attainable, and, as far as is at all practicable, should be attained. With this view the present edition is issued. The chorales, choruses, and solos have been newly and independently translated from the original German words, and the adaptation of the narrative of the Evangelist, a task rendered perhaps somewhat less difficult and hazardous by the aid of the Revised Version of the New Testament, has been carefully reconsidered and re-arranged so as to preserve unaltered, as far as may be, the musical text of the original.

* UNA

FOURTH AND FIFTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL, OCTOBER 4, 1893.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer, living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

CANTATA.

† THE TEN VIRGINS

Third Edition. Seventh and Eighth Thousand.
This Edition contains the additional Soprano air "Sun of my Soul."

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

* JOAN OF ARC

Staff Edition. Sixteenth to Twentieth Thousand.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

FIFTH AND SIXTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

† ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

The above Cantatas have been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral.

Paris the 23d. of December

My dear Sir

Mario has communicated to me your letter, and he told me that he does not like what you said about the testimonial to me, and I must confess you I don't like it too I certainly thank you for your kind idea but believe me it is much better not to have done such a thing all the people will think that it is a humbug

The English public gave me for so many a year such affection for me the English have been so good and kind to me, that for all my live I shall love the English and England as my own country and the idea of leaving for ever this beautyfull country

makes me quite miserable and unhappy; for that reason, my dear Sir, don't make any subscription for me.
This idea makes me quite miserable. Suppose, my dear Sir, that I shall like, or that my own interest will oblige me to stay on the Stage another year? if you do what you said in your letter to Mario, I could not of course go back to my dear

England again.
With kind regards from Maria and me, Believe me always your truly
Giulia Grisi

P. S. My dear Sir, I am sure that the Opera of Ballo in Maschera of Verdi will have an immense success it is a beautyfull Opera and the music suit to me very nicely

"Elijah."—"Mr. Sunman is no stranger to Deal. We can only reiterate the eulogistic terms in which we have previously spoken of him. A striking characteristic of his singing is that he enters heart and soul into the work, and his magnificent voice is adaptable alike to secular and sacred music. The 'burden of the day,' so far as the soloists were concerned, on this occasion fell upon Mr. Sunman, but he proved himself thoroughly equal to the task. . . . Mr. Sunman took the part of Elijah throughout with very great success. The recitatives and the air, 'Lord God of Abraham,' were sung with a depth of feeling thoroughly in accord with the words, and especially was this noticeable in the air 'Is not His word like a fire?' in which, as well as in the air 'It is enough,' Mr. Sunman thoroughly carried away his audience. The telling air, 'For the mountains shall depart,' was one of his finest renderings."—Deal Mercury, February 1, 1896.

"From the layman's point of view, the great, the supreme merit of Mr. Smith's system consists in the fact that it involves the total abolition and disestablishment of all that terrible scale practising and five-finger exercising from which the much-enduring next-door neighbour has suffered so grievously and so long."—Westminster Gazette, November 20, 1895.

THE MUSICAL TIMES
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
MARCH 1, 1896.

JOSEPH BARNBY.

We cannot be satisfied with the hurried words which appeared in this journal last month having reference to the sudden removal of Sir Joseph Barnby. Something more than the usual biographical details is required in the case of any man who has occupied a prominent position and done something which his contemporaries have recognised as a claim to honour and gratitude. Such a man certainly was our departed friend, and in the columns of The Musical Times that fact should be made prominent. All the world of music knows that between Joseph Barnby and the conductors of this journal existed, for many years, a close personal and business relationship. It is among their happiest reflections that the house of Novello was the means, after he had left his native city and settled in London, of extending to him material encouragement. They recall, too, with peculiar pleasure the fact that through the same agency opportunity was given for demonstrating and maturing in most practical fashion their friend's exceptional qualities as a choir-trainer and conductor, and for placing his merits as a composer in public sight. Association so close and prolonged cannot lightly be treated when, in the order of nature, the ties are broken, when voice no longer answers to voice, or hand meets hand. At such a time, besides dwelling gratefully upon the past, the lessons of a closed life may best be gathered up, and a character, for ever withdrawn into the serene region which lies beyond human passion and failing, obtain the recognition which is its due.

To say that man is determined by the circumstances of his environment is, perhaps, to underrate the forces of human nature. The philosopher, indeed, tells us that we should bend circumstances to our will, but, unhappily, philosophers are apt to take upon themselves the privileges of the poet and create in fancy that which does not exist in reality. Every day experience teaches us that some men are born to good luck and others to luck that is bad; this being only another way of saying that some have been fortunate, and others unfortunate in the conditions and surroundings of their lives. In the matter of Joseph Barnby, it seems to us beyond question that Providence was wholly kind. Born into a musical family, with inherited musical tastes, he was like the seed that fell upon good ground. All things were suitable to his development: the place readily found for his boyish gifts in the choir of a great and solemn Minster, where, day by day, "service high and anthem clear" brought him under the direct influence of art in its most exalted application; and, besides this, long, steady, quiet training, at a susceptible age, in the finest and most fruitful school which England can boast. Such an atmosphere every sensible man would most readily choose for the development of youthful talent, and in it Barnby received a first healthy, orderly impulse towards the career in which he was to gain distinction. The impulse was, of course, general, in the direction of music as a whole, but it was markedly particular from the very nature of the case, and Barnby, as a Church musician, kept to the path wherein his early steps were guided. Study at the Royal Academy did not divert him from what may have seemed a natural and pre-destined road. Had it done so there would have been no occasion for surprise, since we all know that the attractions of secular art are great; and its ways obviously decked with lights and flowers—with all the charms congenial to youth. But, whether from force of early training or from the shrewd commonsense which was his through life, Barnby remained faithful to religious music, and, making a humble beginning as organist and choirmaster, passed by decisive stages to one of the highest peaks of his profession. We must respect and honour the qualities he evinced as a conductor and head of a great school, but before and above everything else the ex-chorister of York Minster was a servant of those great and solemn rites in which, faithfully carried out, there is more than enough to satisfy the most craving soul. As may be supposed, we include here the work Barnby did as a Church composer. That will remain, a permanent memorial when time shall have effaced all recollection of triumphs at St. Andrew's, Wells Street, and elsewhere. To it, therefore, one looks with particular interest, and to it we must direct peculiar attention.

The complete list of Barnby's writings, though it would not be specially remarkable as that of a musician who restricted himself to composition, is a very striking monument of industry in the case of a man constantly engaged with other branches of the profession. Under the head of "Services," twenty-one works or arrangements are mentioned. These include only one complete Service, but there are two settings of the Te Deum, six of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, four arrangements of the Preces and Responses, besides chant forms of the Canticles, Offertory Sentences, &c. It is, however, when we come to Anthems that Barnby's greatest strength and fecundity appear. This part of the list contains forty-six numbers, and includes provision almost for the entire round of the Christian year. There are Anthems for Advent, Christmas, and Easter; for harvest celebrations and wedding rites; for St. Michael's Day and Ascension; for Trinity and the Feasts of Apostles and Martyrs, besides, of course, a large number for general occasions. From forty-six Anthems to two Cantatas—"Rebekah" and "The Lord is King"—is a great drop, suggesting that the composer recognised some real or fancied limitations in that direction, though they do not appear in the structure and character of either piece. A number of Hymn-tunes — not less than 250 — thirteen Carols, nineteen Songs, thirty-two Four-part Songs, composed or arranged; five Trios for female voices, two Organ Pieces, and two Pianoforte Pieces complete the roll; looking into the details of which, one is struck with the vast preponderance of religious music and the steadiness with which Barnby kept mainly to the path of his early training and his personal sympathies.

Concerning the merits of Barnby's music, a precise opinion can only be formed after careful examination and classification. But an important general remark is this—that the composer showed himself in sympathy with the musical feeling of his day rather than with the austere scholasticism of an earlier time. The fact might easily have been different, since Barnby's most impressionable years belonged to a time in which the older school of Church composers flourished and the era of free effects and what was then looked upon as operatic sentiment had only just begun to dawn. Barnby, however, had few tastes in common with the contrapuntists. He was essentially, if not assertively, a man of his own era. While shunning frivolity and the undignified, he did not at all see why the Church should be closed against musical developments in the direction of ornate or even pretty effects. To this he gave practical expression in his works, but always with the prudence and self-restraint which were conspicuous in his musical career. Hence the popularity of his compositions as things having in them the modern spirit yet not offensive to older tastes. We cannot forestall the judgments of the future, and it remains to be seen whether Barnby's anthems, &c., will win for him a lasting place among the finest masters of Church song; but one would fain believe, and can scarcely resist prophesying, that not a few of them will go down to far distant posterity, and to that extent assure the fame of their author.

Next in importance to the departed musician's various Church labours must be placed his work as a conductor. This should be considered with reference to two distinct branches—direction of choral compositions and of those exclusively orchestral. We employ the word "distinct," because many of the qualities necessary in the case of a choral conductor are independent of those essential to a chef d'orchestre, and a man who fails in the one department may attain even to eminence in the other. On the whole, and with regard merely to executive success, the function first-named strikes us as more onerous than the second and as demanding qualities wider in range, if not more profound. An orchestral conductor has to do with comparatively few performers, all more or less cultured and skilful, whom experience has made quick to understand and execute, and who, moreover, cannot afford to trifle with their task or taskmaster. A choral conductor, on the other hand, has to work upon a mass of amateurs, unequal in attainment, varying in devotion, needing to be humoured, and generally quick to resent what they regard as improper treatment. No doubt the difficulties are less in some cases than in others, but we have indicated those which, to some extent, are generally present. A choral conductor, therefore, needs the rare power of keeping men and women in good humour, while exacting from them all the work that may be necessary and enforcing all the discipline required.

As the conductor of an orchestra running alone, and not merely in accompaniment, Barnby's opportunities were few, save for a period during which he did work that has largely escaped the notice of his biographers. We refer to his direction of the daily orchestral concerts in the Albert Hall, through the season of 1873. The repertory in this case is now before us, and contains eighteen symphonies, forty-seven overtures, seven concertos, seven marches, and five works described as "miscellaneous." The daily concerts given during the winter of 1874-5 were more mixed and "popular," but the catalogue contains, nevertheless, a long array of instrumental compositions. The support given to these enterprises was scanty, and both Barnby and his orchestra strove against depressing conditions; but the general merit of the performances was surprisingly high. With characteristic shrewdness and self-knowledge, however, the then rising musician saw where his chief strength lay. As a choral conductor he felt in himself the power of supremacy and proceeded to develop it accordingly. His great success all men know. It mattered not whether the music was that of the oratorio, the secular cantata, or the madrigal. Wherever voices were chiefly concerned, there he was master of the situation. Some excellent choir-trainers were his contemporaries, but not his equals, much less his superiors. In this respect his death involves an unqualified loss. Barnby's compositions remain, but the qualities which made him a great choral conductor have vanished with his life, and by so much is music in England the poorer.

Our friend had not sufficient time given him to show his full resources as principal of a great School, nor do we know the precise conditions under which he laboured during the few years vouchsafed to him. But an indeterminate condition in this case does not impair the value of his life and work. We could ill spare him, but there remains to us the force of his example—the power of single-mindedness which lies at the root of all distinguished achievement. For that let us preserve his memory.

J. B.

HANS VON BÜLOW IN HIS LETTERS.*

Under the editorship of Bülow's widow, who has evidently regarded her task as one of love and pious devotion, the world has recently been enriched by the publication of two volumes, comprising two hundred and forty letters, which were penned during the period 1841-55, and together cover over nine hundred pages. By far the greater number of them were addressed by Bülow to his father, mother, and sister, and only a few to such well-known musicians as Fr. Wieck, J. Raff, Th. Uhlig, Liszt, Fr. Kroll, P. Cornelius, R. Pohl, Alexander Ritter, R. Radecke, and L. Köhler. By way of throwing light upon the context, letters from other individuals are occasionally interpolated—e.g., from Franziska von Bülow (Bülow's mother) to her daughter, from Liszt and Wagner to Bülow's parents, and from Berlioz to Bülow.

Though the letters of young men to their parents and sisters are generally of a perfunctory kind, and therefore devoid of general interest, this cannot be said of Bülow's. Couched in a thoroughly filial and reverential manner, those addressed to his parents read like the utterances of a friend to a friend on equal terms. He seems to have withheld nothing from them, and to have told them all that most interested himself, and which, as he thought, would most interest them. Thus, during his school and his college days, we find him discoursing upon his scholastic studies, the lecturers and preachers to whom he had listened, quite as much as upon music, the study of which, under competent teachers, his parents encouraged in his earliest days as a humanizing element, and without any thought of his making music his profession; but which, as the event proved, was fated to exercise so strong an influence upon his future life, to the great disappointment of his parents (especially his mother), who had set their hearts upon his studying jurisprudence, with the view to his becoming a Government servant or diplomatist. The announcement of his determination to devote himself to music and to music alone came upon them as a most heavy blow, though it was one which must have long been foreseen. Most heartrending are the letters addressed to his parents excusing and justifying himself for this irresistible determination, and begging their forgiveness for the step he had taken, and which for a long time caused a most unhappy estrangement between them.

The task of collating and editing this first instalment of Letters has been carried out in a thoroughly admirable and practical manner. The Letters are grouped in chronological order in sections, determined by the places of residence from which they were addressed, each section being prefaced and sometimes supplemented by explanatory notes of the circumstances and situations under which they were written. Such a plan adds greatly to the value of the collection of Letters, as it supplies biographical particulars which have hitherto been wanting, and at the same time furnishes a tolerably complete and connected narrative of Bülow's early life. Occasional foot-notes relating to the identity of personages alluded to in the Letters are also given, but in a future edition these might advantageously be extended.

Bülow has never been spoken of as an infant musical prodigy. As a child he suffered from delicate health, and it was not till he was nine years old, by which time he had survived five serious attacks of brain fever, that he suddenly evinced an extraordinary love and talent for music. These qualities developed themselves with such rapid strides that in two years' time he might fairly have been invested with the title of "prodigy."

Hans Guido von Bülow, a worthy scion of a noble family, and the "wonderful son of a wonderful mother," was born at Dresden on January 8, 1830. Here, together with his sister Isidore, three years his junior, he spent his childhood, as well as his early school-days (1840-45), in his parents' house. Always a delicate child, he was tenderly nurtured, and his education, though adequate, does not seem to have been unduly pressed forward. A practical knowledge of French was insisted upon, and at a later date instruction in pianoforte playing, under Fr. Wieck, was provided.

It has been said, perhaps with good reason, that it is impossible to overwork an unwilling boy. The greatest sufferers are those who voluntarily impose upon themselves an inordinate amount of work. This was the malady from which Bülow suffered throughout his life. Even in his early days the books which formed his daily reading were by his own choice of an æsthetical, philosophical, and historical character, rather than simply amusing.

During his school years at Dresden (1840-45) Bülow was often sent on visits to Leipzig, where he was the guest of Frau Livia Frege, a relation of his mother's. This lady was an accomplished singer, whose house was regarded as the head-quarters of musical life in Leipzig. A friend of Mendelssohn's, she was often the first to sing his songs, and did the same for Bülow's. To have found himself in such congenial surroundings, where he made the acquaintance of many musical celebrities, must have been a great advantage and encouragement to him.

* Hans von Bülow, Briefe und Schriften. Band I. und II. Briefe von Hans von Bülow herausgegeben von Marie von Bülow. Leipzig: Breitkopf und Härtel. 1895.

The first nineteen letters (1841-45) are addressed to his parents and sister while on excursions to various places. The first, written from the house of Frau Frege in May, 1841, to his mother, at once arrests attention by its clearness of diction and childlike naïveté of expression. As the production of a boy of eleven years of age, it is far in advance of his years. A fac-simile of it is given as a sample of his hand-writing, which even at that early date was fully formed and of a singularly graceful character. In many of his letters of this early period he gives proof of the possession of a critical acumen, which in after years served him in such good stead. On speaking of a visit to a hippodrome, he does not content himself with describing the performance, but goes on to criticise the performers. Similarly in regard to the operas which he heard. Though Bellini's "I Capuletti et i Montechi" greatly pleased him, he had no hesitation in giving the palm to Mozart's "Don Giovanni," and thus readily proved his musical astuteness. In June, 1843, we find him with his father on a visit to Weimar, and shortly afterwards at Kissingen, where, for his health's sake, he drank the waters and took baths. The following year he is again back in Leipzig, where he wished to remain as long as possible for the sake of the music there, for here he had made acquaintance with Mendelssohn, Madame Schumann, and other musicians, and, though not taking regular lessons, wished to learn all he could from them. At that date he could already play Fugues by Bach, several of Beethoven's Sonatas, and, among other pieces, Hummel's Septet and Concerto in A minor. He had already composed a good many songs, &c., and expressed a longing to try his hand on an opera, if only he could find a good libretto, especially if it were a comic one. In 1845, while still in Leipzig, he received regular lessons in pianoforte-playing from Plaidy and in harmony from Hauptmann. "Je travaille comme un nègre," says he, "and every morning practise exercises and scales, studies by Moscheles and Steibelt, and a two-part Fugue by Bach, which, as Otto Goldschmidt recommended me, I play in octaves for both hands." That Frau Frege then enlisted his services as accompanist and encouraged him to compose songs for her must have been a great benefit to him.

In 1846 the Bülow family removed from Dresden to Stuttgart, where, while living with his parents, he attended the Gymnasium. Though regretting the change to a city which was not dominated by classical taste, seeing that Mozart, Beethoven, and Weber might only be played during the absence of the King, he had the good fortune to make acquaintance there with Joachim Raff, who, eight years his senior, exercised a strong influence upon him; and also with Molique, whose violin-playing he often accompanied, and who was otherwise kind in letting him have the run of his musical library.

Passing over long accounts of a tour which he made with his father to Coblenz, Ems, Andernach, Laach, &c., we come to an important point in his career. His friend Ritter had submitted some of his (Bülow's) compositions to Wagner, from whom, to his great joy, he received the following characteristic letter: "Your works, dear Herr von Bülow, have given me great pleasure; I would not give them back to your friend Ritter without accompanying them with an encouraging cheer for you. I abstain from criticism; you will get enough of that without my help, and I feel myself the less inclined to count up the weak points and other things which have not pleased me, because I perceive from all the rest that you will soon be in a position yourself to criticise your earlier attempts. Go ahead, and let me soon see something else!"

It was on New Year's Day, 1848, that Bülow made his first appearance in public as a pianist—viz., at a Concert in Stuttgart, where he played a Fantasia on themes from J. Raff's "Prätendenten."

The spring of the same year found him back again at the Frege's house in Leipzig, where he had entered himself as a student at the University. He describes his life here at this period as more like that of a model Philistine than of a student. Club-life (Corps-leben), with its rules, coarseness, and views of politics, by no means attracted him. He would far rather, he says, have joined one of their thoroughly radical associations, but for fear of offending his mother and her relations with whom he was residing. "Think," says he, "I have never once supped with my comrades, but always at home en famille."

Though he does not seem to have neglected his University studies, music was always paramount. Not only did he practise regularly, but spent a good deal of his time in composing. We hear of a string quartet and other works which were not destined to see the light in black and white. He had frequent opportunities too of listening to music which was new to him, and speaks rapturously of the Ninth Symphony, "Tannhäuser," and Liszt's playing.

Moscheles was among those who befriended him. On one occasion of his calling upon the professor the talk was about Chopin. On Bülow's playing a Notturno of Chopin's to him, Moscheles remarked that it ought to be played in a more lively manner, more rubato, quite fantastically, and hardly ever in strict tempo.

He backed up this opinion by stating that when his married daughter, who had received instruction from Chopin, played to him (Moscheles) among other things a new Mazurka by Chopin, she indulged so freely in tempo rubato that the whole piece had the effect of being in 2-4 instead of in 3-4 time. It is curious to hear of so conservative a musician as Moscheles being thus "Chopinised"!

FROM MY STUDY.

The interesting letter of Madame Grisi given as an extra supplement last month is now followed, appropriately enough, by one from Madame Tietjens, addressed to the same manager, E. T. Smith, written at the same period, and having reference to the first-named of these distinguished epistolars. It is easy to gather the story of the document from its own pages—a very common story, relating to one of the "tiffs" that occur, with the order and continuity of a natural process, between artist and impresario. It is evident that Tietjens had got the better of the ex-policeman whom Fortune, in waggish mood, raised to the throne of an opera house; and it is also clear that the lady enjoyed the situation and asserted her advantage after a fashion which would have made a sensitive man wince. But E. T. Smith was not sensitive. He had, however, some perception of humour, and, probably, as he read the letter, the walls of his managerial sanctum flung back the loud laugh in which he was wont to indulge. Tietjens was a good and kindly soul, but she was also a woman, and her references to Grisi show it. A delightful feeling of toleration, such as young people are apt to show towards their elders, is expressed in the words of the German artist, while the double reference to the Italian singer's age is a touch of true, if not particularly amiable femininity.

N°

Monsieur Davison,

Permettez de recommander à votre attention un artiste de premier ordre, M. Dumon, le plus remarquable talent de flûtiste de l'époque actuelle et professeur de son instrument au Conservatoire royal de Bruxelles. Il se propose de se rendre à Londres au commencement de la saison prochaine, pour s'y faire entendre dans les Concerts. Je vous serais infiniment obligé si vous vouliez bien lui faire obtenir quelque engagement. Dès qu'il aura été entendu, sa réputation sera bientôt faite.

Agréez, Monsieur, l'assurance de mes sentiments distingués.

but the writer's personality gives it interest. François Joseph Fétis was, at the date of the letter, head of the Brussels Conservatoire, which post he had held since 1833. It was natural and proper for him to feel concern regarding the future of the young artists sent out from the Institution over which he presided, and here we discover Fétis recommending one of them to the leading English critic of the day. I have no doubt that J. W. Davison, to whom such a letter would be almost a command, did what he could for the Belgian flautist. In these matters he was good nature itself. Fétis is so famous as author of the "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens" that the younger generation of readers may be surprised to hear of him as distinguished in any other way. He was, however, a many-sided man. As a composer the highest point he reached came far short of greatness, but he had the virtue of industry and wrote operas, symphonies, overtures, quintets, quartets, church music, and pianoforte music with the perseverance of a man having a thorough belief in himself. His books on the theory and history of music are numerous, and at least two of them have appeared in English—namely, the "Méthode Elémentaire d'Harmonie et d'Accompagnement" (Cocks and Co.) and "Traité du Chant en Chœur," translated by Helmore, published by Novello, Ewer and Co. As a musical lexicographer, Fétis has no great reputation for accuracy; but, an English writer has well observed of the "Biographie" and the "Histoire Générale," "however easy it may be to find fault with these standard works, it is impossible to do without them." Fétis was a man of strong opinions, which some called prejudices.

In a recent issue of this journal the hope was expressed that, as an American writer had styled "The Messiah" an English work, he would cease giving Handel's name as "Händel." I then had no idea that the diphthong had been used in this country, but when idly turning the leaves of a volume of "Ackerman's Repository," the other day, "Händel" caught my eye. It appears to have been noticed also by a contemporary reader, who inquired of the editor which form was the more correct. Here is the answer as printed in the magazine:—

"The question is not liable to a doubt. The composer's name was 'Händel' or 'Haendel,' written with the German diphthong ä, or ae, both being used alike by the Germans, precisely as in the case of Mälzel, or Maelzel, the inventor of the metronome. The English a in 'hand,' 'band,' &c., having the same sound as the German diphthong, may have led to the disuse of the latter in this case; or it may have been dropped in the same manner as is daily the case with Germans of similar names residing in England, such as 'König,' 'Köhler,' &c., who are invariably called Konig, Kohler, &c., and many of whom adopt this mutilation in their own signatures. All the German biographies of our composer spell his name with ä, and there are medals extant on which it is spelt in the same manner."

The writer of the foregoing remarks knew something about the matter, but not much. Handel's family name was of uncertain orthography even in Germany, where it is known to have taken these forms: Händel, Hendel, Händeler, Hendeler, Hendtler, and Handelin, the last occurring in Handel's will as the name of a cousin to whom he made a bequest. In Italy, the master wrote himself Hendel, and, on coming to England, he Anglicised his names (with a whimsical spelling of the second) into George Frideric Handel. Thus did he subscribe himself in all documents, and thus was he known by his contemporaries. Mainwaring, in his Memoirs (1759), calls him George Frederic Handel, and even the German, John Christopher Smith (Schmidt), uses the same names in his "Anecdotes." Taking all these facts into consideration, and remembering that Handel became a naturalised Englishman, there seems to me no possible question which form has the best right of usage and survival.

From a very miscellaneous mass of information issued, many years ago, with the words of songs in use at Evans's Supper and Music Rooms, Covent Garden, I extract the last will and testament of W. Humnys:—

> To God my soul I do bequeathe, because it is his owen;
> My body to be laid in grave, where to my friends best known;
> Executors I will none make, thereby great stryffe may growe,
> Because the goodes that I shall leave will not pay all I owe.

Humnys, who plainly had a sense of humour, was a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal, temp. Edward VI., and author of the following works: "Certayne Psalmes," "Seven Sobs of a Sorrowful Soul for Sin," "A Handful of Honeysuckles," and "Blessings out of Deuteronemie."

Last month I quoted, from Angelo's "Recollections," a passage referring to a music tavern in the City of London. I have since lighted on the following: "But the most diverting and amusing of all is the Mug House Club in Long Acre, where, every Wednesday and Saturday, a mixture of gentlemen, lawyers, and tradesmen meet in a great room, and are seldom under a hundred. They have a grave old gentleman in his own gray hairs, now within a few months of ninety years old, who is their president, and sits in an arm'd chair some steps higher than the rest of the company, to keep the whole room in order. A harp plays all the time at the lower end of the room, and every now and then one or other of the company rises and entertains the rest with a song and (by-the-by) some are good masters. Here is nothing drank but ale, and every gentleman hath his separate mug, which he chalks on the table as it is brought in, and every one retires when he pleases, as from a coffee-house. The room is always so diverted with songs, and drinking from one table to another to one another's healths, that there is no room for politicks or anything that can sow'r conversation. One must be there by seven to get room, and after ten the company are for the most part gone." Meetings of this sort still linger among us, but the conditions of modern life are scarcely favourable, and I doubt whether the ten o'clock closing is observed.

The thirteenth Discourse of Sir Joshua Reynolds contains a passage which should be of interest to those who demand realism on the lyric stage. He contends that in the development of an art which fundamentally deviates from nature, the utmost liberty should be permitted. Poetry is such an art, and Sir Joshua says: "The manner in which poetry is offered to the ear, the tone in which it is recited, should be as far removed from the tone of conversation as the words of which that poetry is composed. This naturally suggests the modulating of the voice by art, which I suppose may be considered as accomplished to the highest degree of excellence in the recitative of the Italian Opera; as we may conjecture it was in the chorus that attended the ancient drama. And though the most violent passions, the highest distress, even death itself, is (sic) expressed in singing or recitative, I would not admit as sound criticism the condemnation of such exhibitions on account of their being unnatural. If it is natural for our senses and our imaginations to be delighted with singing, with instrumental musick, with poetry, and with graceful action, taken separately; (none of them being in the vulgar sense natural, even in that separate state) it is conformable to experience, and therefore agreeable to reason as connected with and referred to experience, that we should also be delighted with this union of musick, poetry, and graceful action, joined to every circumstance of pomp and magnificence to strike the senses of the spectator. Shall reason stand in the way, and tell us that we ought not to like what we know we do like, and prevent us from feeling the full effect of this complicated exertion of art? This is what I would understand by poets and painters being allowed to dare everything; for what can be more daring than accomplishing the purpose and end of art by a complication of means, none of which have their archetypes in actual nature? So far, therefore, is servile imitation from being necessary, that whatever is familiar, or in any way reminds us of what we see and hear every day, perhaps does not belong to the higher provinces of art." This important passage is well worth the consideration of those who, witnessing a lyric drama, refer every part to real life as a standard of merit and hanker after Mr. Vincent Crummles's "practicable pump." The question is not of conformity to the real, but of approach, through the ways of art, to a pleasing and elevating ideal.

While repudiating the character of prophet, Mr. Gevaert, in an essay on "Music the Art of the Nineteenth Century," speculates on the possibilities of the future, and finds some of them by no means pleasant. He puts these questions: (1) "Has musical culture any chance of understanding itself farther, or even of maintaining itself in its present state?" (2) "Is not its existence put in peril by the tendencies of modern democracy, turned exclusively towards material well being?" Continuing, Mr. Gevaert suggests as music's greatest danger "the gigantic development which the means of execution have undergone in the course of the present century." Pointing to this, the Belgian master says: "The music of the present time is not the humble flower of the prairie which blossoms spontaneously, and concerns itself neither with the hardness of the soil, the wind, nor the rain. It is a marvellous hot house plant, which, if it is not to perish, demands assiduous and intelligent care, and expensive tools." For its preservation and growth a vast and costly organisation is required, and Mr. Gevaert plainly conceives the possibility of social changes operating unfavourably to the continuance of the present system. He goes on: "What would happen in our country of the West if professional instruction in music ceased to be effectively protected by the State, and remained abandoned to private enterprise?" He answers his own query by indicating the various stages of decay as dismal as the process by which we reach Campbell's Last Man. The steps downward would be slow. Favourite instruments, as the violin, would continue in favour; there would be choral societies and military bands, but "who would be so self-devoted as to consecrate years of study and practice to instruments which do not find employment outside the orchestral ensemble?" Now follow a string of Cassandra-like utterances:

"In all likelihood this part of our musical material, after two or three generations, would pass into the condition of historical curiosities. Then would cease the integral performance of symphony, musical drama, and oratorio. From that moment, one would probably see, as at the last period of Greco-Roman civilisation, a series of partial dissonances fatally fettered in movement. At first, the disappearance of the highest forms of musical art, those which demand the assistance of a collection of capable technicians; later, after a vogue, more or less prolonged, of the secondary forms, the gradual disappearance of all regular culture in the art; finally, the extinction of the most elementary musical knowledge, even to the signs of the notation. We may ask, what would survive of our vast musical repertory in the memory of men, two hundred years after the last orchestra had been heard?"

This is a terrible outlook, and it is comfortable to find that Mr. Gevaert does not prophesy its realisation. But even if he did, there would be no need to distress ourselves. It is by no means certain that social changes, even unadulterated socialism, would rob music of its present means of support. The consequences might be all the other way. Mr. Gevaert seems to have forgotten that the Paris Conservatoire was founded amid the passion and agony of the Revolution, and he evidently does not appreciate the fact that the people of England have kept music in a healthy, advancing condition, with no help worth speaking of from the national purse. All the same, Mr. Gevaert's remarks are food for thought. The multiplication—nay, the exaggeration of means in modern music goes on apace, and none of us want to see our art in the condition of Berlioz, who, according to Wagner, lay "buried amid the ruins of his own machines."

X.

A VISIT TO THE LIBRARY OF THE PARIS CONSERVATOIRE DE MUSIQUE.

Paris is at all times more or less crowded with visitors; yet of these probably few pay a visit either to the Bibliothèque Nationale or to the Library of the Conservatoire. For foreigners to gain admission to the former, a letter of recommendation must first be obtained from the Embassy of the nationality to which they belong. The Library of the Conservatoire is open to the public, yet though I went there for a whole week during the last month, the readers appeared to me to be young students of the Conservatoire; and of these, some were engaged in conversation rather than study. Youths will be youths; later in life, one or other of those whom I saw may, perchance, regret that he did not make better use of his time.

The small room in which students consult works is scarcely worthy of the magnificent collection of which the Conservatoire can boast. At one end there is a complete set of the "Revue Musicale," edited by M. Fétis, from 1827 to 1835, and of its continuation, in larger form, the "Revue et Gazette Musicale de Paris." At the opposite end is a door leading to the private room of M. Weckerlin, the present librarian, to whose courtesy and kindness I am indebted for much valuable information gleaned during my short visit. On the walls of the reading-room hang portraits of Gossec, Méhul, Auber, Berlioz, Levasseur, and Martin. Méhul is represented standing in the street, surrounded by a crowd to whom he is singing the "Chant du Départ," one of the many patriotic songs which he composed. To the immediate left of the entrance door is a short corridor leading to a room in which are treasured many valuable printed and autograph scores and portraits. Nearly all the works of Berlioz are there: "Lelio," written at Rome, on sheets of various sizes, and in large hand-writing which contrasts strangely with the neat penmanship of the French composer's later years; "La Damnation de Faust," with its well-worn pages; "Les Troyens," &c. The autograph scores of Auber's "La Muette de Portici," of Rossini's "Zelmire," and of Verdi's "Don Carlos" form features of special interest. In connection with Auber there is a curious souvenir in this room — viz., some quill pens used by the veteran composer shortly before his death during the terrible days of the Commune; they were preserved by Auber's friend, M. Weckerlin, who was constantly with him during his last illness. And then there are some magnificently bound volumes of music which belonged to Louis XIV., XV., XVI., and Marie Antoinette; these were sent in parcels to the then newly-founded Conservatoire from the Tuileries, during the stormy days of the French Revolution. For well-nigh a century the parcels lay hidden away in cupboards or on shelves; and M. Weckerlin was actually the first to untie them.

While writing his "Life of Handel," published in 1857, M. Victor Schoelcher had collected much music and literature relating to the Saxon composer, all of which he bequeathed to the Conservatoire. There are over sixty editions of "The Messiah," not to mention cases containing pianoforte and organ arrangements, popular settings of favourite numbers, band parts, &c., of the oratorio. At some future time I shall hope to speak of the Handel literature, also, generally, of some of the rare autographs and volumes in the Conservatoire. For the present, however, just a few words about one or two of the "The Messiah" editions.

Among them are some of considerable interest. The earliest printed, that of J. Walsh, containing, however, only the songs in the oratorio; the reprint made by Randall, Walsh's successor, from the Walsh plates; also the full score published by Randall and Abell; all these are to be found there. Of other editions I may name "The Messiah, arranged for Pianoforte or Organ by Dr. John Clarke of Cambridge," published by Jones and Co. (Temple of the Muses) in 1835, with an engraving by W. Raddon from the celebrated picture (St. Cecilia) by Raffaelle in the Bologna Gallery; another arrangement for organ or pianoforte by Dr. Clarke, also with an engraving (Christ bearing His Cross) "from a Fine Original Picture by Carlo Dolci in the possession of S. J. Button," and "Handel's Sublime Oratorio of The Messiah, arranged for Organ, Pianoforte, or Seraphine by W. Carnaby, Mus. Doc., Cantab.," containing a picture of Handel, drawn on stone by S. T. Purday, from an authentic portrait painted by Hudson.

To some of the editions there are prefaces both curious and interesting. The oratorio was "adapted for Piano Forte by J. Mazzinghi," and published in 1802 by Goulding, Phipps, D'Almaine and Co. In a short preface the adapter describes the attempt "to Alter or Abridge the composition of the Immortal Handel" as "the greatest Folly and Presumption an Individual could be guilty of." He remarks further that nine-tenths of Pianoforte Amateurs "not being sufficiently advanced in Science to render this truly Sublime Music Effective when play'd from the Score," this pianoforte edition, "a result of some Labour, is presented to the Musical World." And he hopes, therefore, that "no censure can attach." This apology for a reduction of a score for pianoforte is surely unique. Again, in "The Messiah arranged from full score by F. C. Walker," published by Jos. Hart, there is a curious preface from which I extract the following: "Critics have striven hard to prove a charge of plagiarism against Handel for some parts of this Oratorio, but (with the exception, perhaps, of the Pastoral Symphony) there is scarcely sufficient to justify the accusation, and the writers have done little else than display the envious and illiberal feelings by which they were actuated." I wonder what the writer would have thought of the numerous charges of plagiarism which have been brought against Handel within the last quarter of a century.

The writer goes on to express admiration for Mozart, "who added to the original score full orchestral accompaniments, which greatly increase the effect of the choruses, and at the same time reflect the highest honour upon the liberality of that great composer." It may be mentioned, in passing, that the additions and alterations made by Mozart in the choruses were of quite subordinate importance, as compared with those which he made in the solo numbers. The mention of additional accompaniments to "The Messiah" recalls, of course, the names of J. Adam Hiller, Mozart, and Robert Franz. But an edition in M. Schoelcher's collection reminds us that there was yet another composer who attempted to improve the master's score. The title-page of this edition runs as follows: "Der Messias. Nach Mozarts und Schwenkes Bearbeitung für das Pianoforte zu vier Händen, eingerichtet von G. W. Marks. Aug. Cranz, Hamburg." This Schwencke (C. F. G.; b. 1767, d. 1822) was the successor of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach at St. Catherine's Church, Hamburg. In the notice of him in Mendel's "Conversations-Lexikon" it is stated that he re-scored not only Handel's "Messiah," but also Bach's Mass in B minor.

There is a long and interesting preface to the edition of the Oratorio, arranged for organ or pianoforte by William Horsley, Mus. Bac., Oxon., and published by Cramer, Beale and Co. The adapter indulges in a little criticism. He tells us that the "author yielded too much to his love of imitation. With respect to 'The people that walked in darkness,' the Prophet intended in that passage to show the mental darkness—the darkness of heathenism which should prevail before the coming of the Saviour. Handel, overlooking the figurative expression, has given a movement descriptive of people walking in the dark!" Mr. Horsley might have had the courage of his criticism and informed his readers how "mental darkness" could be expressed in music. He complains, and, perhaps, with better reason, of Handel's treatment of the words "All we like sheep." This, he says, "is the language of deep contrition; but our author has mistaken the true import of the text, and has, therefore, given an improper expression to it." According to our critic, "the principal defects of the work consist of the almost numberless divisions with which it abounds."

Mr. Horsley, by the way, is one of the writers who repeated the error of the Rev. J. Mainwaring with regard to the first performance of "The Messiah." The latter stated that it was performed in London, April 12, 1741—i.e., more than four months before it was written. In S. T. Purday's edition of "Handel's Sublime Oratorio, The Messiah, arranged for Organ, Pianoforte, or Seraphine by W. Carnaby," the date September 12, 1741, is given—still two days before, according to the autograph score its termination. It is curious that Mainwaring only gives the date; Hawkins, Horsley, and the writer of the Purday preface expressly state that it was given in Covent Garden Theatre.

Among the early editions of "The Messiah," I mentioned the one made by Randall, using the plates prepared by his predecessor, Walsh, for his edition of the "Songs in 'The Messiah.'" From those Walsh and Randall plates Mr. J. Alfred Novello printed his 1850 edition of the full score of "The Messiah." M. Victor Schoelcher, on the title-page of the last-named edition, calls attention to the fact that Coventry and Hollier's catalogue contains an edition of "The Messiah" (also of "Judas Maccabæus," "Acis and Galatea," "Coronation Anthem," and "Dettingen Te Deum") similar to that of Mr. J. A. Novello, and enters the following query:—"Est-ce eux (i.e., Messrs. Coventry and Hollier) que l'on doit accuser d'un faux commis?" The veteran biographer of Handel lately joined the majority, and I know not whether he ever solved that query. For the sake, however, of any who may see it and desire a solution, it may be mentioned that the plates were bought from Messrs. Coventry and Hollier by Mr. J. A. Novello; each firm in turn, therefore, had perfect right to print from them.

Mr. Asquith, who has never been hitherto regarded as anything but a serious politician, recently pronounced himself in favour of the introduction of an occasional musical hour at the House of Commons. The suggestion, which is full of rich and strange possibilities, has elicited a good deal of comment, and we should not be in the least surprised if "tea on the terrace"—so popular a feature in recent sessions — were to have its attractions enhanced by vocal and instrumental performances by the members and their fair friends. One reforming senator, so we read in a leading contemporary, "has declared himself favourable to a kind of 'harmonic warning' being laid on in the lobby. On Scotch days a 'braw, Heeland laddie' might promenade the tiles wildly 'skirling' with a set of State bagpipes. The smokers, the chess-players, and the tea-sippers would then know what fate awaited them if they ventured within reach of the Speaker's vision. On purely English days—these would be only rare and far between—'The Roast Beef of Old England' could be played at the door of the dining-room by a foreign orchestra. British dining-rooms are never befittingly equipped unless musicians from the Continent provide the obbligato to the dish-clatter. On Welsh days a Cymric Bard might be entrusted with a harp, which he would play during the hours he was graciously permitted to live; and on Irish festivals the sounds of 'tumult within' would dispense with the need for outer admonitions." The "Concert of Europe" has so far proved a failure. Let us hope that the proposed Concerts at St. Stephen's may be more conducive to promote the amenity of political life.

The extraordinary prominence of the virtuoso—whether vocalist or instrumentalist—as compared with the composer has elicited some remarks in the New York Times which are not without their interest to Cis-Atlantic readers. "Once upon a time," says the writer, "great names in the operatic world were Rossini, Gounod, Verdi, and Wagner; but to this complexion have they come at last that they are mere makers of cloth for the De Reszkes, Melba, Nordica, and Calvé to cut into robes of glory for themselves. As for Schumann, Chopin, and Liszt, who are they but purveyors to his Imperial Majesty, Ignaz Paderewski? And Brahms, Dvorák, and Tschaikowsky?—mere peddlers of poor symphonies to make a Boston Symphony holiday. The composer is dethroned and the virtuoso reigns supreme. Who would not be a Calvé, to steal the laurel from Bizet; or a Melba, to stand, with the support of a flute, between the sun and Donizetti?" The situation is summed up in the cry: "Give us our great vocalists—no matter what the opera—or give us English burlesque." That the condition of affairs is forcing itself upon the attention of opera-goers is proved by a letter to another New York paper, in which the writer suggests that Messrs. Abbey and Grau should produce "The Bohemian Girl," with Melba as Arline, Calvé as The Gipsy, Jean de Reszke as Thaddeus, Edouard de Reszke as Devilshoof, and Plançon as The Count!

One of our contributors has sent us the following reminiscences of the late Sir Joseph Barnby: In the late sixties, St. Andrew's, Wells Street, was my Mecca and Barnby was my Prophet. Sunday afternoons at St. Andrew's were followed by Tuesday evenings in a dingy little hall off Oxford Street, where Barnby drilled his then newly-formed Oratorio Choir. The lessons in organ accompaniment and choir training which I, with others, learnt from Barnby at that time have been invaluable. Many years afterwards, I was an adjudicator with him at a choir competition at the Crystal Palace. After the contest we lunched together, and the conversation naturally turned to the old St. Andrew's days, when Mr. Edward Lloyd was the solo tenor in the choir of that musically famous church. "I'll tell you how I found Lloyd," said Barnby. "Mr. Hervey,* now of Sandringham, then an undergraduate at Cambridge, used frequently to come to St. Andrew's. He had often urged me to visit him at Cambridge. At last I went, and at a time when we were seeking a tenor for St. Andrew's. As we were walking in the College court, Hervey said to me: 'That man going along there is Lloyd, our tenor, of whom I have often spoken to you. He is going to sing "If with all your hearts" at King's this afternoon.' (Lloyd was then a lay clerk at King's and Trinity.) I went to King's," said Barnby, "and afterwards telegraphed to my vicar, Mr. Webb: 'Lloyd very good: shall I engage him?' The reply came: 'Use your own discretion.' The result of my visit to Cambridge was that Lloyd came to London. He was engaged to sing at St. Andrew's for three months on trial. Before the period of probation had expired, Mr. Webb said to me: 'I don't think so very much of your friend Mr. Lloyd. Do you think we should keep him beyond the three months?'"

Barnby's first organ appointment was at Mitcham Parish Church, where, strangely enough, Dr. E. J. Hopkins, like Barnby, in his teens, first officiated. "I lived at Westminster then," said Barnby, "and used to walk six miles to Mitcham and six miles back every Sunday. I couldn't afford to ride, even if there had been any suitable conveyance." His accounts of the service at St. Paul's Cathedral forty years ago were amusing. On one occasion Attwood's "They that go down" was the anthem. "There were no tenors or basses in the choir on that day, only trebles and two altos. One of the altos jumped about from his part to the tenor or bass as occasion required, the other man sat down!" It may not be generally known that Goss's expressive anthem, "O Saviour of the World," owes its origin to Barnby. "I was very much struck," he said, "with the beauty of those words in 'The Order for the visitation of the sick'—'O Saviour of the World.' One day I was sitting with Goss in the organ loft of the Chapel Royal, at which he was the official 'Composer.' I handed him the prayer-book, and, pointing to the passage, I said: 'I wish you would set these words to music.' Goss read them and replied, 'You try your hand.' 'No,' I said, 'words like these should be set by an older man than I, one who has had a deeper experience of life.'" Goss ultimately acceded to Barnby's request and, as we all know, composed the anthem, "and," said Barnby, with a little touch of pride, "he dedicated it to me." The original (folio) edition of "O Saviour of the World" bears the inscription, "To his friend, Joseph Barnby, Esq."

Barnby was a born disciplinarian, and his intense thoroughness was well known. An instance of this came out in his story of how he "found Docker," now Barnby's worthy successor at St. Andrew's, Wells Street. "I was rehearsing the boys," he said, "and they failed to take a diminished fifth down. I was determined that it should be done, so I took each boy separately. They each failed to sing the interval. Then I tried the probationers in the same way, but with the same result, till I came to the last little chap. He sang it perfectly in tune. His name was Docker." I could continue these pleasant reminiscences—as, for instance, how, when he first read the lyric in Tennyson's "Princess," he received a direct inspiration for the melody of "Sweet and Low"—but space compels me to refrain from adding to the pleasant memories of the warm-hearted genial friend whose terribly sudden death has made poorer the cause of music in England.

Many musicians have recently been doing honour to the 125th anniversary of Beethoven's birthday, but it may with truth be said that no greater testimony to the genius who was born to the world in 1770 will be contributed this year than Sir George Grove's book, now on the eve of publication, on the Bonn master's Symphonies. As Dr. Hubert Parry said at one of his masterly Lectures at the Royal Institution upon "Realism and Idealism in Music," Beethoven "changed the attitude of men's minds towards the art. The ideality of Haydn and Mozart was broken down by the passionate humanity of Beethoven. From the first the element of human emotion was perceptible in his most characteristic work, and music became the expression of men's earthly hopes and fears." How this was done, with what infinitude of pains, of wrestlings and struggles for adequate expression is shown in Sir George Grove's volume, the perusal of which will assuredly enhance the enjoyment of intelligent listeners to the Symphonies which have long ago earned the right to be spoken of as "the immortal nine."

The forthcoming publication of Mr. F. G. Edwards's "History of Mendelssohn's Elijah" will form an important memento of the fiftieth anniversary of the production of the oratorio at Birmingham. Mr. Edwards is one of the most painstaking and reliable writers on musical matters of the past that we now possess, and in this instance he has had placed at his disposal documentary evidence of peculiar interest. Through the kindness of Miss Mounsey, the author has acquired the originals of fourteen letters on the subject of the English translation of "Elijah," which Mendelssohn wrote to her brother-in-law, the late Mr. William Bartholomew; and the same lady has given him access to a collection of MSS. that will appeal to all lovers of the oratorio. Mrs. Victor Benecke (Mendelssohn's elder daughter) has permitted the publication of several letters relating to "Elijah," which have hitherto been unknown, and has also allowed the portrait of her father, taken in 1835, to be published for the first time as the frontispiece of this book. Generous help has also been given by Mrs. Carson, Dr. Carl and Dr. Felix Klingemann, Dr. Julius Schubring, Mr. Felix Moscheles, Mr. William Moore, Mr. Andrew Deakin, and Mr. J. S. Shedlock. But enough has been said to indicate the artistic value of the volume, which will doubtless be widely read, for no composer is more appreciated in English homes than Mendelssohn.

The arrangements for the first Sheffield Festival have now so far taken definite form that the date and choice of works have been decided upon. The Festival will take place in the Albert Hall, Sheffield, on October 13 and 14 this year. Four Concerts will be given, the works to be performed including Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Sullivan's "Golden Legend," Parry's "Job," and Berlioz's "Faust," together with a number of orchestral and vocal pieces. It is proposed to secure the services of Mr. August Manns as the conductor of Sheffield's first Festival. Dr. Henry Coward, whose efforts in assisting to found the Festival deserve full acknowledgment, will undertake the preparation of the chorus. The Crystal Palace Orchestra is to be engaged, with a supplementary contingent of about twenty local instrumentalists. A guarantee fund has been started and is being generously responded to, the present Mayor of Sheffield (the Duke of Norfolk) heading the list with £500.

A new book of "Scales and Arpeggios," by Mr. Franklin Taylor, will shortly be added to Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.'s valuable series of "Primers." In addition to the usual combinations of scales, in similar and contrary motion, useful preparatory exercises are given, both for scales and arpeggios, which will assist the student in acquiring the necessary positions and movements of the fingers. In particular, the book should prove of service to candidates for examinations, as it will be found to contain the whole of the technical material required for the examinations of the Associated Board, &c.

The "Quartet?" contributed by Mendelssohn to the late Miss Eliza Wesley's album, and which we printed in our last Number (p. 89), has excited a good deal of interest. A solution of the query will be given in our April Number.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

A contemporary, referring to the representation of the "Daughter of the Regiment" at Daly's Theatre, correctly mentions Jenny Lind and Marie Marimon as having played the part of the heroine in London. With them should be associated Clara Louise Kellog, for whom the opera was revived by Mr. Mapleson at Her Majesty's Theatre, in, or about, 1866. The American prima donna had taken lessons on the side-drum, and was an expert performer. Upon this accomplishment she prided herself, and I well remember the emphasis with which she said to me, "My drum will be no dummy. I know how to make it speak." And she did.

"Strike, say you?" exclaims a transatlantic quietist to the members of the Musical Protective Union. "When it comes to our brass bands and wind instrument tortures striking, we beg you to keep it up. Boycott us, keep away from us yourselves, and prevent others from coming near us. We will pay our quota to support you in idleness if you will organise a perpetual strike and eternal boycott."

According to an American paper, Madame Melba has announced her conversion to Wagner. That settles it.

Musical critics should oppose any restriction of their already limited vocabulary, and especially guard the synonyms of "performed," "sang," "played," "rendered," "executed," &c.—they are not too many for the incessant use required, and this is why I comment upon a remark made by my esteemed colleague of the Standard. Noticing a Popular Concert, and Emanuel Bach's Sonata in C minor, the critic said: "From the wording of the analytical programme, it might be supposed that it had not been heard at these concerts before yesterday; but it was introduced at one of them in 1885." As the only "wording" in the analysis which bears upon the matter consists of "The Sonata in C minor now to be introduced," it would appear that the writer in the Standard attaches, in this connection, but one meaning to "introduced"—viz., performed at the "Pops." for the first time. I turn to the testimony of the dictionaries, and find, in Webster, the following: "Introduce. 1. To lead or bring in; to conduct or usher into a place. 2. To conduct and make known; to bring to be acquainted. 3. To bring something new into notice or practice. 4. To bring in; to impart. 5. To produce, or cause to exist.—Locke. 6. To begin; to open to notice. 7. To bring before the public by writing or discourse." The word is thus seen to be capable of very comprehensive use, and applies as correctly to a performance of the "Hallelujah" Chorus as to the production of a piece hot from the press. It is, therefore, a precious word, and I shall go on employing it in all its seven significations as occasion may arise.

With reference to a paragraph in our last from Winkler's Musical Miscellany, of Kingston, Jamaica, Sir George Grove writes: "I do not recollect the name of 'Plumb Point,' and do not believe that it was in existence in 1841. The spot on which I erected the Iron Lighthouse, designed for the Commissioners by Mr. Alexander Gordon, of 22, Fludyer Street, Westminster, is the farthest East point of the Island, and was then known as 'Morant Point.' Morant Bay and Port Morant are ten or twelve miles to the West, on the South side of Jamaica."

The following anecdote is not untimely at the present moment. A certain vocalist complained, at a provincial musical festival, that her name appeared in smaller type than the name of Clara Novello. The more favoured singer said, when appeal was made to her on the matter: "Oh! very well; print the lady's name in large type and mine in small. It is of no consequence."

In Sir Arthur Sullivan's letter to the Times, pointing out that Lord Leighton broke through the traditions of the Academy banquet by inviting musicians to the table and toasting their art, the writer, without directly intending it, gave a sample of the ornate eloquence which, by its suggestion of artificiality, belied the President's unquestionable earnestness. The passage contains a description of music as "the divine art to which it is given at one moment to sweep the very inmost chords of human emotion and, at another, to light us out of and above our earthly selves into a region of rapt serenity which the din of life may reach only as the half-heard murmur of a distant sea." Probably the distinguished personages at the high table put all this down, with some wonder, as a necessity of the speaker's position.

I gather from an "inspired" communication that "Shamus O'Brien," now in rehearsal at the Opera Comique, is altogether an Irish work, subject, librettist, and composer alike being products of the Green Isle. Moreover, "several of our most popular Irish singers are in the cast." By all means, and I heartily cry "Erin-go-bragh."

Mr. Whately W. Ingall calls attention to a letter he has received from the Colonial Secretary, in which Mr. Chamberlain declares that "he does not see any objection to giving power to local authorities to contribute money for the purpose named (local orchestras)." Nor, I imagine, does anybody. By all means "make the bounds of freedom wider yet" in the matter of self-government. But we should then be no nearer the realisation of Mr. Ingall's amiable dream. The Joey Bagstocks of our parish, district, and county councils would become purple with indignation at the mere idea of taxing their neighbours and (especially) themselves for mere music.

The following has come to hand from the hon. secretary of the committee in charge of the musical arrangements for the national Eisteddfod at Llandudno: "My committee have completed engagements with the following artists for their Eisteddfod Concerts, June 30, July 1, 2, 3: Miss Macintyre, Miss Gertrude Hughes, Miss Maggie Davies, Mrs. Belle Cole, Miss Hannah Jones, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, Mr. Hirwen Jones, Mr. David Hughes, Mr. Ffrangcon Davies. Band and chorus, 400. Conductor, Dr. Roland Rogers. Several new works will be performed for the first time: a new historical cantata, 'Cambria,' by Dr. Joseph Parry; a prize Cantata by Dr. Rogers, also a short choral ballad by Mr. G. H. Pugh, Mus. Bac. 'The Messiah' will also be performed."

The arrangements for Lenten music at Marylebone Parish Church include performances of Gounod's "Redemption" (Part 1), on the 4th and 18th inst. and April 1; also performances of Stainer's "Crucifixion," on the 11th and 25th inst. and on Good Friday. No tickets required.

The Roman Times is a journal published in (peculiar) English, and its musical criticisms read funnily to those who know the language "as she is spoke" in these islands. It would be unfair to the reader were a single word taken from the notice subjoined:

The Sala Dante was full of elegant people last Wednesday all were interested to hear the young artist of whom the public begins already to think and speak much. They say that Pecskai has already been in Italy two years ago, but as I have not heard him then I can not judge if already at that time he promised what he held. A mere boy yet, he masters his instrument with a "maestria" unknown to old musicians and what is still more incredulous he plays with so much feeling so much taste as if he was one of the renowned veterans of the art His violin sings and enraptures the hearers and than again the young artist executes with the greatest facility tecnical difficulties that seem impossible: as in the "Trille du diable" by Tartini or in the "Chaconne" by Bact where he literally plays two sounds at the same time or the "Csardas" by Hubay where he develops an incredible quikness of play.

We engage every friend of music to go to his last concert, Sunday morning, and the more so as half of the income will go to the wounded soldiers in Africa, so the public can do a good work in spending pleasantly his time.

The violinist as to whom the writer does not know whether, two years ago, he "promised what he held," and who "literally plays two sounds at the same time," is, in the English of the Roman Times, truly "incredulous."

I am in receipt of a word for Jullien from a veteran amateur, who claims that the English masses owe their education in classical music primarily to the inimitable "Mons." My correspondent asks: "Who has recognised the great merit of the work he commenced? Where is the Jullien scholarship as a memorial of his genius?" Echo answers: "Where?" and experience of life bids me say that it is too late for monuments to Jullien. Save in exceptional cases, memorials of departed worth are chiefly promoted by "pushful" men for personal reasons, and there is nothing to be got out of poor Jullien now. All the same, it was he who began the education of the million in musical classics. Nothing can rob him of that distinction, whatever the rights of his claim to have written "Peter the Great."

I read in a contemporary: "According to a Milan correspondent of the Berlin Courier, the failure of the operas of Richard Wagner at Rome, Naples, and Turin is to be attributed less to Italian musical taste than to the rivalry between the publishing houses of Ricordi and Sonzogno." That is one way of saving Italian musical taste. Again I read: "Ricordi became possessor of the author's performing rights in Wagner's works in Italy by purchasing the business of Signora Lucca, not by the choice of Bayreuth. Ricordi was and is an opponent of Wagner." Surely this is very far-fetched! When I am told that a man of business, such as Mr. Ricordi is well known to be, spends a large sum on certain works and then endeavours to spoil his own market, I answer, with ample apology for an emphatic monosyllable, Fudge!

A private letter from Vienna informs me that the title of Goldmark's forthcoming opera is "Das Heimchen am Herd," the exact German equivalent of "The Cricket on the Hearth." At present, the composer is making some changes in his overture, but the preliminary rehearsals are going on. This work should have a special interest for English amateurs, especially those who, in despite of problem fiction and the unsavoury, retain their taste for Dickens.

A writer in the Philadelphia Record has started a curious, but, to my mind, not over-exact, parallel between Beethoven and Dr. Johnson. He says:

Beethoven was the Dr. Johnson of music. He lacked the Englishman's profound piety and curious superstition, just as Johnson lacked Beethoven's vast horse-humour and horse-play, visible even in his music. Johnson was ponderously eloquent, while Beethoven was seemingly spontaneously magnificent. But in their curious life-careers, their morbid disease and shocking personal slovenliness, their personal appearance, their eccentricities of manners and temper, each irresistibly suggests the other. Haydn once scornfully styled Beethoven "the Great Mogul of Music"; and was not Johnson christened "the Great Cham of Literature"?

The same writer states: "Beethoven admired the uncrowned Napoleon immensely, was a frequent attendant upon his levées, and a certain intimacy, even, is said to have existed between them." The passage I have put in italics should have been supported by authorities.

A short leader appeared in a recent issue of the Manchester Guardian touching the appointment of Mr. Cowen as successor to Sir Charles Hallé. The writer, after speaking of Mr. Cowen as a prolific composer and an experienced conductor, observed: "Mr. Cowen's thorough competence as a musician and his remarkable business capacity are thus placed beyond dispute." Very good, but the sting of this article is in its tail. It questioned Mr. Cowen's fitness to follow Hallé, or, at any rate, said that fitness was a question. Why? For this reason: "The best of Mr. Cowen's compositions are characterised by technical accomplishment and by general musical facility rather than by any sort of artistic aim, while in most of his minor compositions, and especially in his countless songs, he has simply catered for the average taste of the public." What have Mr. Cowen's merits or demerits as a composer to do with the case? He has been engaged as a conductor to do the work of a conductor, in succession to a man who was not a composer at all.

Replying to the Guardian, Dr. Hiles does not neglect the obvious point just made, and concludes his observations thus: "Therefore the opinion of your new critic as to the merits of the Welsh Symphony has nothing to do with the question, and, were it ever so relevant, the value must be small which could attach to the verdict of a gentleman who asserts that the work is based upon national melodies and who finds a Symphony written in 1884 reminiscent of the devices of Dvorák."

JOSEPH BARNBY.

Home-coming ships into their haven glide,
Leaving no sign of passage o'er the deep,
Which, whether tempest-tossed or as asleep,
Fills up the keel-made furrow in the tide.
But tokens of their presence still abide
In far-off climes, where, 'neath some rocky steep,
Or where, o'er level sands, the waters creep,
Firm love-knots binding land to land are tied.

Strong Toiler, sudden called where labourers rest,
E'en should Time's stream, with never-ending flow,
Obscure thy name and mem'ry, still thou'rt blest;
For in the temple, once so poor and low,
Of England's music they have place confessed
Who raise its towers to meet the dawning glow.

AMBROISE THOMAS.

"The Shadow cloak'd from head to foot, Who keeps the keys of all the creeds," has been seen so often of late in the high places of art, that when news came of his visit to Ambroise Thomas the shock was one of sorrow rather than of surprise, for of eminent musicians deceased, scarce a dozen reached the age at which the composer of "Mignon" has passed away; and regret is, therefore, not embittered by thoughts of aspirations unfulfilled or activities brought to a sudden stop while in their plenitude. This musician, at least, died full of years, as well as full of honours. Charles Louis Ambroise Thomas was born at Metz, August 5, 1811, and was, therefore, half-way through his eighty-fifth year when he sank to rest, on the 12th ult. Both his parents were in the musical profession, and M. Pougin possesses a prospectus stating that "M. et Mme. Thomas ont l'honneur d'annoncer qu'ils viennent d'ouvrir une Ecole d'enseignement mutuel pour la musique à l'instar de celles de Paris et de plusieurs autres grandes villes, pour l'un et autre sexe." Little Ambroise became his father's pupil at the age of four, first as a vocalist, subsequently as a student of the violin and pianoforte. In 1828 he entered the Paris Conservatoire and, at the end of his first year, obtained the prize for pianoforte playing, his master in this branch having been Zimmermann. In 1830, under Dourlen, he won the first prize for harmony and accompaniment, and, two years later, as pupil of Lesueur, Kalkbrenner, and Barbereau, he won the "Prix de Rome" with a cantata, entitled "Hermann et Ketty," written by the Marquis de Pastoret. During the three probationary years in the Italian capital the young musician won the warm friendship of everyone by his personal qualities, his industry, and his pianistic gifts. The great painter, Ingres, then at the head of the school, became much attached to him, and, writing to a friend of the pleasure his young protegé had given him by his playing, spoke of him as "an excellent young man, who has in his head and heart everything that Mozart, Beethoven, and Weber has written." Among Thomas's earliest compositions published at this time was an album of six songs, entitled "Souvenirs d'Italie," copies of which have now become exceedingly rare. His first operatic venture was a one-act comic opera, "La Double Echelle," which ran for 200 nights. It was produced at the Opéra Comique, August 23, 1837. This was succeeded by "Le Perruquier de la Regence," in three acts (1838). "La Gipsy," a ballet written in collaboration with Benoist and Marliani, was produced at the Opéra in 1839; and in the same year his "Le Panier Fleuri" was given at the Opéra Comique, his versatility being further proved by the composition of a Requiem. There followed in quick succession "Carline" (1840), "Le Comte de Carmagnole" (1841), "Le Guerillero" (1842), "Angelique et Medor" (1843), and "Mina" (1843). None of these were permanently successful, a fact which may be attributed to the speed of their production. "Le Caïd," given in 1849, rapidly became popular, and still figures in the répertoire of French opera companies. "Le Songe d'une Nuit d'Eté" (1851), a little masterpiece, was followed in the same year by "Raymond," the overture of which is well known in England. During the next ten years Thomas composed five works, not one of which has kept the stage. Then followed a time of inaction, which the composer utilised to such excellent purpose that, in 1866, he came forward with "Mignon," the work by which his name is most widely known. The original cast of the opera was as follows: Mignon, Madame Galli-Marié (who later created also the part of Carmen in Bizet's opera); Philine, Madame Cabel; Wilhelm, M. Achard; Laertes, M. Couderc; Lothario, M. Bataille. In 1868 another of Thomas's best-known works saw the light, at the Grand Opéra, "Hamlet," to wit, which had the good fortune to be interpreted, as regards the parts of Ophelia and the Prince, by Christine Nilsson and Faure. On the death of Auber, M. Thomas was appointed his successor as Director of the Paris Conservatoire, and from that time but few compositions emanated from his pen. Of these, the most important, "Françoise de Rimini," was produced in 1882. Ambroise Thomas died at his residence in Paris, on the 12th ult., of congestion of the lungs.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

To see the ladies of the Albert Hall Choir without their becoming coloured sashes and with black gloves, and the male members of the force wearing black ties, was to recognise that some trouble had befallen, even without the knowledge that their beloved chieftain had suddenly and unexpectedly paid the debt of nature. The promised performance of "Judas Maccabæus" being very properly postponed, we have only now to speak briefly of the usual Ash Wednesday rendering of Gounod's "Redemption," on the 19th ult. This was conducted by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who, it is understood, will retain the duties until the end of the present season. The executants were, of course, anxious to do their best on such an occasion, and the sacred trilogy of the French master has rarely been given with more impressive effect. We have nothing but praise for the principal vocalists, Mesdames Esther Palliser, Margaret Hoare, and Belle Cole, and Messrs. Charles Copland, Lloyd Chandos, and David Bispham, the last-named artist being especially earnest in the part of the Redeemer. Between the parts Sir Arthur Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture was played, the whole of the vast assemblage standing throughout the piece.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

At Mr. Henschel's sixth Beethoven Concert, on the 6th ult., St. James's Hall was again well filled. Excellent performances were given of the "Egmont" Overture, the "Pastoral" Symphony—will this work ever grow old, we wonder?—the Choral Fantasia, and Wagner's "Meistersinger" Overture. It is a happy thought this of putting one Wagner piece in each Beethoven programme. So many Wagner Concerts, of late years, have included one Beethoven number that it is only fair for the modern master to pay, so to speak, a "return visit" to his great predecessor. Between the "Egmont" Overture and the Symphony were placed Clärchen's songs from the incidental music to Goethe's drama. When we say that their exponent was Mrs. Henschel, every music-lover will understand that they were delivered with abundant charm of voice and style, and perfect comprehension of the composer's meaning. Mr. Leonard Borwick undertook the pianoforte part of the Choral Fantasia, the vocal soloists being Mrs. Henschel, Miss Gladys Wood, Miss de Dreux, and Messrs. Karlyle, Haydn Bailey, and Arthur Barlow. These were loyally supported by Mr. Henschel's Choir, and a capital rendering of the popular work was the result.

The Concert of the 20th ult. began with the seldom-played "Namensfeier" Overture (Op. 115), which was followed by the beautiful Elegiac Ode (Op. 118) for four voices and strings, sung with deep feeling and admirable delicacy by Mrs. Henschel, Miss Margarethe Boye, Mr. W. Shakespeare, and Mr. G. E. Holmes. A notable feature of the evening's music was the admirable performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, the solo part in which was interpreted with much nobility and purity by Mr. Maurice Sons. The exceptional heartiness of the applause which broke out at the close of the first movement showed that Mr. Sons' taste and skill had not been thrown away. The Symphony was the glorious No. 7, in A, of which a broad and spirited reading was given, and the Wagner excerpt consisted of the Overture to "Tannhäuser."

QUEEN'S HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

This Society marked Ash Wednesday (the 19th ult.) by a meritorious performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," with Rossini's "Stabat Mater" as a supplement—a combination of opposite styles that is still exceedingly popular. The choir, now strengthened by a number of boys from the London Training School, exhibited exceptional efficiency and watchfulness. The majestic strains of the "Hymn of Praise"—particularly the first chorus, "All men, all things," and the choral, "Let all men praise the Lord"—were sung with the utmost solidity and excellent balance of tone, whilst due regard was paid to expression. The improvement characterising the choir under the control of Mr. Randegger could not have been more manifest. Equally satisfactory was the rendering of the choral portions of the well-known setting of the old Latin hymn. In both works Miss Alice Esty sang with taste as well as fervour, Madame Belle Cole gave sympathetically the music assigned to her, Mr. Ben Davies was quite at his ease with the "Watchman" solo and the "Cujus animam," and Mr. Watkin Mills delivered the "Pro peccatis" in an irreproachable manner. The instrumental introduction to Mendelssohn's Sinfonia-Cantata, like the subsequent accompaniments, was capitally played. Mr. Randegger once more proved his fitness as conductor.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

After the customary recess this valuable series was resumed on the 15th ult., when Herr Willy Burmester made his début before the Sydenham audience. The Hamburg virtuoso chose for his principal effort Spohr's Violin Concerto in E minor (No. 7), and although the dexterity of his bravura playing was perhaps the most prominent feature of his performance, he rendered ample justice to the suave cantilena of the slow movement. Later on in the afternoon he gave a familiar air from one of Bach's Suites and his own version of Paganini's Fantasia on "Nel cor più non mi sento," in which his command of transcendental gymnastics was displayed, to the delight of audience and orchestra. Owing to an alteration in Herr Burmester's selections, the Intermezzo from Reznicek's "Donna Diana"—introduced at a recent Mottl Concert—was postponed to a future occasion. Mrs. Katharine Fisk, appearing in place of Miss Ada Crossley, who was disabled by a cold, sang the air "My heart is weary," from Goring Thomas's "Nadeshda," and Leoncavallo's "Schwerer Abschied," with considerable power and beauty of expression. The Symphony was Beethoven's No. 7, in which the Crystal Palace Band is always heard to the greatest advantage; and in honour of the anniversary of Wagner's death, which falls on February 13, the Overture to "Rienzi," the Vorspiel to "Parsifal," and the "Kaisermarsch" were included in the programme, the performance of the first-named piece being particularly effective. Mr. Manns, who conducted with all his wonted vivacity, was greeted with great cordiality on mounting the platform.

One of the chief attractions of the Concert given on the 22nd ult. was again Mr. Burmester, who, in Paganini's first Concerto, found exceptionally favourable opportunities for the display of his unique powers as a virtuoso. The ease with which he vanquished the difficulties of this work was nothing short of ridiculous—at least to those who realised the nature of the feats involved. In three short pieces by Bach he shone more conspicuously as an artist. The orchestral pieces were Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, Weber's "Oberon" and Dvorák's "Carnaval" Overtures, and the Prelude to Mr. D'Albert's opera "Der Rubin," given for the first time in England. The young Scottish composer's opera was produced at Carlsruhe in 1893, and the Prelude, therefore, represents his talent after more than ten years of German training. It is well scored, and shows a nice feeling for melody, but otherwise it utterly fails to realise the promise shown by its composer in 1881, when, under the influence of his training at South Kensington, he composed the Concerto which astonished even those to whom his gifts were best known. Mr. D'Albert is shortly to appear before us as a performer, in which capacity, no doubt, he will shine more brilliantly. The vocalist was Miss Kirkby Lunn, whose singing of songs by Gounod and Frances Allitsen was much appreciated.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

So little has been done during the period now under remark at Mr. Arthur Chappell's performances, either in the way of novelties or the introduction of new artists, that brief record will suffice. On January 25, Brahms's String Sextet in G (Op. 36)—a much finer work, though not so popular as the earlier companion work in G (Op. 18)—beautifully played, with Lady Hallé as leader, and Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 47) were the principal features in the programme. Miss Eibenschütz was very refined as the pianist, and the same remark will apply to Mr. Braxton Smith as the vocalist.

On the following Monday the scheme commenced with Smetana's Quartet in E minor, first introduced here on December 3, 1894, seventeen years after its original production. But, at any rate, the merits of the Bohemian composer are now beginning to meet with recognition, and this Quartet is one of his most characteristic works. Again Miss Eibenschütz was the pianist, and she gave a brilliant interpretation of Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques, though her tempi in some of the sections were surely too quick. Brahms's concise Pianoforte Trio in C minor (Op. 101) was included in the programme, and Mr. Hugo Heinz was the vocalist.

On Saturday afternoon, the 1st ult., the concerted works were Beethoven's Quartet in C (Op. 59, No. 3) and Mozart's Pianoforte Trio in G (No. 8). Miss Fanny Davies, who is one of our best interpreters of Schumann's pianoforte music, played, with the fullest expression, six numbers of the master's "Kreisleriana," and Miss Mary Thomas was extremely pleasing in vocal pieces by Stradella and Henry Smart.

Mozart's Quartet in G minor, erroneously headed "G major," was the first work on the following Monday, and was exquisitely rendered. Mr. Isidor Cohn gave a fairly intelligent performance of Schumann's Pianoforte Sonata in G minor (Op. 22), and the programme ended with Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in E flat (Op. 1, No. 1). Miss Ada Crossley displayed her perfectly trained contralto voice in songs by Beethoven and Ambroise Thomas.

On Saturday, the 8th ult., Beethoven's very Mozart-like Quartet in G (Op. 18, No. 2) was associated with Brahms's frank and unlaboured, but certainly uninspired Trio in E flat (Op. 40), written for pianoforte, violin, and horn, and beautifully played on this occasion by Lady Hallé, and Messrs. Leonard Borwick and Paersch. The pianist's solos were some thoroughly characteristic pieces by the Russian composers, Arenski and Rachmaninoff, to which he did full justice. Mrs. Helen Trust may be warmly commended for her choice and execution of old English ditties by Arne and Shield.

The mere mention of the fact that the leading features of the scheme on Monday, the 10th ult., were Haydn's Quartet in E flat (Op. 71, No. 3) and Schumann's Pianoforte Trio in D minor (Op. 63), the latter being a work in which the composer's individuality is very strongly expressed, will suffice. Mr. Leonard Borwick played Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor (Op. 35, No. 1), and Miss Ada Crossley's pure and well-trained contralto voice was heard in the song "L'Addio," erroneously attributed to Mozart, and in airs by Massenet and Chaminade.

Passing lightly over the following Saturday Concert, when Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata was no doubt mainly instrumental in drawing a very full audience, Brahms's genial Quintet in G (Op. 111) being included in the programme, we come to the last performance we can notice at present—namely, that of Monday, the 17th ult., when Dr. Joachim made his re-appearance. That the unrivalled Hungarian violinist is still in the fullest possession of his powers was shown by his magnificent leadership in Beethoven's Quartet in E minor (Op. 59, No. 2) and the same composer's early but vigorous Trio in C minor for strings (Op. 9, No. 3). Dr. Joachim played as his solo the Adagio from Spohr's Violin Concerto in E minor (No. 11), and Miss Fanny Davies was admirable in three of Brahms's "Clavierstücke." Mr. Hugo Heinz sang with perfection of method Rubinstein's "Es blinkt der Thau" and Chaminade's "Toi."

HANDEL'S "HERCULES" AT THE PEOPLE'S PALACE.

By the performance of "Hercules" on the 8th ult., at the People's Palace, the Handel Society called attention to one of the master's fine works which has long been neglected; the last time the oratorio, or rather "musical drama, after the manner of an oratorio," was given in London took place, we believe, under the direction of the late Mr. Henry Leslie. The recent performance of the work at Mainz, under the superintendence of Dr. Chrysander, appears to have suggested the revival here. Of that Mainz performance a detailed notice was given in The Musical Times of last August; its special feature was an approximation to the conditions of its original production. A similar attempt was made at Mile End, only Dr. Chrysander's introduction of cadenzas for the vocalists was not imitated. Although there are no such cadenzas in the conducting score of "Hercules," such embellishments were inserted in other scores, so that, as the writer of the notice mentioned above observes, "objectors must be careful how they attack them as non-Handelian." It will be unnecessary to repeat here the peculiar composition of the orchestra; we merely endorse the statement of the Mainz "Special Correspondent" that the effect was both satisfactory and impressive. Much has been written about additional accompaniments, and the question of revising the scores of the old masters is indeed a vexed one. The attempt, however, to reproduce them as nearly as possible cannot reasonably be objected to. By so doing one obtains a clear idea of the master's method of grouping instruments and of obtaining striking contrasts. Such performances must not be looked upon merely as antiquarian curiosities.

The vocalists at the People's Palace were Miss K. Lunn (Dejanira), Miss M. Davies (Iole), Miss S. Bristow (Lichas), Mr. Francis Harford (Hercules), Mr. J. Probert (Hyllus), and Mr. A. Wells (Priest of Jupiter), all of whom deserve commendation. The chorus sang well. Professor Prout presided ably at the pianoforte, the modern representative of the old harpsichord; Mr. E. G. Croager rendered good service at the organ, and Mr. J. S. Liddle conducted with care and decision.

QUEEN'S HALL SUNDAY CONCERTS.

On the 2nd ult., in memory of Lord Leighton and Sir Joseph Barnby, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony headed the programme of the eighteenth Sunday Afternoon Orchestral Concert given this season, at Queen's Hall, under Mr. Randegger. On this occasion Liszt's Concerto in E flat was played by Madame Kisch-Schorr, and Miss Alice Esty sang Elizabeth's two songs from "Tannhäuser." At the following Concert, on the 9th ult., the programme included the "Tannhäuser" Overture and Haydn's delightful Symphony in D (No. 7 of the Salomon set), and violin pieces by Wilhelmj were played with great taste and skill by Miss Beatrice Langley. Mr. Lloyd Chandos sang Mendelssohn's "Be thou faithful" ("St. Paul"). A list of the works performed during the season, including fifteen symphonies (by Beethoven, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, and Schumann), twenty-two overtures, twelve concertos for pianoforte or violin, and thirty pieces of various kinds, were given with each programme and the audience were invited to select one of each class for performance at the Concert of the 23rd ult. The voting resulted in the following selection: Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony (106 votes), "Tannhäuser" Overture (61), Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto (100), and Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite (77). This programme was accordingly performed on the 23rd ult., when, also, Mr. Sims Reeves sang.

The programme for the 16th ult. included Beethoven's Symphony in D, Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, and other things. Miss Hilda Wilson was the vocalist, and the pianist was Mr. Leonard Borwick. Mr. Randegger is to be congratulated on the admirable performances, and the no less admirably drawn up programmes which have hitherto marked these Sunday orchestral performances, which may safely be spoken of as among the very best to be now heard in the metropolis. After the Concert of the 9th ult. Mr. Robert Newman, the popular manager of Queen's Hall, to whom the establishment of these Concerts is due, was called into the band-room, where Mr. Frye Parker, on behalf of the members of the orchestra, presented him with a silver punch bowl, in recognition of his services to music since the opening of Queen's Hall, two years ago. Everyone who knows anything about the subject will applaud this distinctly "happy thought," which shows that, besides being admirable artists, the members of the Queen's Hall orchestra are also men of tact and feeling.

MR. BISPHAM'S CONCERT.

There is much cause for satisfaction in the large audiences which have attended Mr. David Bispham's recent series of Concerts, the last of which took place on the 11th ult., at St. James's Hall. The performances have not only consisted of high-class music, but have comprised the best efforts of many generations of poets and composers, and not a few, therefore, who have listened to them must have gone away wiser and better, inasmuch as the highest in art appeals to the noblest in man. At the final Concert Mr. Bispham, as was meet, bore the burden of the afternoon, and sang several songs of more than usual interest. Of such was "Salomo," by Mr. Henschel, the conception and expression of the voice part and accompaniment of which most happily suggest the barbaric and languorous spirit of Heine's poem. Charming naïvete distinguished "Wie glänzt der helle Mond," by the Norwegian composer, Christian Sinding; pathetic intensity pervaded a setting by Tschaïkowsky of Goethe's "Nur, wer die Sehnsucht kennt" ("No one my grief can feel"); and modern realism was set forth in "Das Stell-dich-ein" ("The Rendezvous"), by Hans Sommer. Attention was also aroused and sustained in unusual degree by three songs sung by Mdlle. Landi. These were an early song entitled "Rossignols" ("The Nightingale"), by Rimsky-Korsakow, which is finished in a charmingly fresh and unexpected manner by a descent of the voice part from the seventh to the third of the scale; by "Attente," a clever and unconventional song by M. Camille Chevillard, one of the most promising composers of the modern French school; and by an excellent example of M. Saint-Saëns's lyrical skill named "La Brise." All these were interpreted in an ideal manner by Mdlle. Landi, to whose fine voice and dramatic perception they were admirably suited. Still further variety was provided by violoncello and pianoforte solos, respectively contributed by Signor Piatti and Miss Fanny Davies. The last-named artist played Schumann's accompaniment to "Schön Hedwig" ("Fair Hedwig") and to "The Fugitives," which were recited by Mr. Hermann Vezin. Concerning these works the annotator of the book of words, Mr. Edgar F. Jacques, had appended the following:—"On December 17, 1852, Schumann wrote to Van Bruck: 'I have written the music to another poem of Hebbel's, "Schön Hedwig"; I have not regularly set it to music, but made it more of a recitation with pianoforte accompaniment. In this way it makes quite a peculiar effect.' In another letter, dated May 8, 1853, the master wrote: 'As "Schön Hedwig" has just arrived, I hasten to send it, and will ask you to give the second copy to Herr Hebbel with my respectful compliments. It is a species of composition such as I don't think exists; and we are always indebted above all to the poets, who so often inspire us to try new ways in art.'" Since this was written this "way" has become very familiar to us. If "time is fleeting," as the poet sings, Art would seem of late years to be keeping pace pretty closely.

MR. CLINTON'S CONCERTS.

On the 21st ult. Mr. George A. Clinton, the well-known clarinettist, gave the first of a series of three Chamber Concerts at Queen's (Small) Hall. Mr. Clinton's programmes contain songs and solos, but their chief features consist of concerted pieces in which wind instruments play the principal part. Thus, for his next Concert, on the 20th inst., the works promised include Hummel's Septet in D, Brahms's Clarinet Quintet (Op. 115), Reinecke's Trio in A minor for oboe, horn, and pianoforte, and the Quartet-Caprice (Op. 74) for pianoforte, flute, oboe, and clarinet, by Saint-Saëns. At his first Concert Mr. Clinton introduced a Quintet, by E. E. Taubert, for flute, clarinet, horn, bassoon, and pianoforte. It is an "Op. 48" and need not therefore be judged solely as a work of promise, from which standpoint it might pass muster. As the production of a composer who has "arrived" it cannot be deemed satisfactory. The music flows along euphoniously enough, no doubt; but like Gratiano, Mr. Taubert "speaks an infinite deal of nothing." If this kind of music needs a hearing—which we deny—we can assure Mr. Clinton that he need not have gone to Germany for an example of it. The scheme included also Spohr's charming A minor Septet for violin, violoncello, flute, clarinet, horn, bassoon, and pianoforte, and Brahms's Sonata for clarinet and pianoforte (Op. 120), besides songs by Schumann and Henschel, sung with customary perfection of style and expression by Mrs. Henschel, and accompanied in his inimitable way by her husband. The artists concerned in the interpretation of the instrumental pieces were Messrs. A. W. Payne (violin), Clinton, Fransella, Ch. Clinton, Wotton, E. Howell, and Septimus Webbe—the last-named of whom also played a couple of pianoforte solos.

MUSICAL GUILD.

A most attractive programme opened the fourteenth series of these Concerts, on the 4th ult., at the Kensington Town Hall. Professor Stanford, most versatile of British composers, was represented by his stirring Cavalier Songs for baritone solo and male chorus and the very fine String Quartet in A minor (Op. 45), a work which, by virtue of its emotional qualities, its spontaneity, strength, and most excellent workmanship, can hold its own by the side of the best modern works of its class. We speak advisedly when we express a preference for this masterpiece of British music over a great deal of the contemporary chamber music in vogue at the present moment. Why is it so rarely heard? On the occasion under notice it was beautifully played by Messrs. Arthur Bent, Wallace Sutcliffe, Alfred Hobday, and Paul Ludwig. Miss Isabella Donkersley took Mr. Bent's place as leader in Mendelssohn's E flat String Quartet (Op. 44). Of this a spirited and expressive performance was given, though here and there the ensemble was not faultless, and suggested a lack of sufficient preparation. Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland played Purcell's fine Suite in G, the same master's Ground in C minor, and Dr. Arne's Sonata in B flat on his famous double harpsichord, with which a modern "grand" could hardly compete as regards variety of tone-colour. Mr. John Sandbrook, besides singing the solos in the Cavalier Songs with all requisite dash and vigour, was also heard in Mr. Henschel's "Jung Dieterich," which, barring some peculiarities in his pronunciation of the German text, he sang very finely.

In consequence of the indisposition of several members of the Guild who had been announced as performers, the programme of the second Concert, on the 18th ult., had to undergo considerable changes. A Violin and Pianoforte Sonata by Mr. Alfred Wall had to be omitted altogether. Its place was taken by Mr. Algernon Ashton's bright Irish Dances for pianoforte duet, played by Mr. Herbert J. Sharpe and the composer. The latter also took part, with Miss Winifred Holiday and Mr. Tennyson Werge, in Beethoven's great B flat Pianoforte Trio (Op. 97), the other concerted piece being Tschaïkowsky's unsatisfactory String Quartet in D (Op. 11), of which a fair performance was given by Miss Holiday, Messrs. Wallace Sutcliffe, William Ackroyd, and T. Werge. Miss Lily Thatcher, who is gifted with a sympathetic light soprano voice, sang two of Dvorák's finest songs and Mr. Willem Coenen's "Lovely Spring" with much charm.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

There was a surprise in store for those who attended the Chamber Concert given on the 5th ult. The programme announced as an extra number "There rolls the deep," from Tennyson's "In Memoriam," without naming the composer. Speculation was naturally rife as to the latter's identity, especially when the piece proved to be a very expressive, deeply-felt four-part setting of Tennyson's stanzas, which was received with such great and prolonged applause that an encore had to be granted—an unprecedented occurrence at these Concerts, we believe. Since then Dr. C. H. H. Parry has acknowledged it as his tribute to the memory of a recently-departed artist friend, and we feel great satisfaction in presenting it to our readers with this number as an extra supplement. That they will consider it a beautiful addition to the répertoire of our numerous choral societies we have no doubt. On the occasion under notice it was excellently sung by Misses Ruby Shaw and Morfydd Williams and Messrs. Norman Jones and Harry Dearth. Mr. Eli Hudson, a very able flautist, took part with Miss E. Gertrude King (pianoforte) in a finished performance of Bach's E minor Sonata for flute and pianoforte, and with Mr. Samuel Grimson and Mr. Edward Behr in Beethoven's long and tedious Serenade for flute, violin, and viola (Op. 25). Miss Marie Motto led Mozart's D minor String Quartet with much care and intelligence, her associates being Messrs. William Read, Edward Behr, and Miss Ethel Uhlhorn-Zillhardt. The choral class sang some of Brahms's lovely four-part songs for female voices (Op. 44), but there was a strange lack of freshness and spirit about the singing. Perhaps the German text hampered the young ladies' efforts, though they pronounced it remarkably well, forsooth.

The orchestra distinguished itself greatly at the Concert of the 14th ult., when Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony received an unusually fine interpretation. The dignity, pathos, and grandeur of this masterpiece of emotional music were brought out in a surprising degree, while it was difficult to find fault on technical grounds. The other purely orchestral piece was M. Saint-Saëns's Symphonic poem "Phaëton," one of those very clever works in which the French school excels. A greater contrast to this than Brahms's Rhapsodie for contralto solo, male chorus, and orchestra, from Goethe's "Harzreise im Winter" (Op. 53), could not be imagined. The solo was expressively sung by Miss Morfydd Williams, but the young gentlemen forming the choir did not distinguish themselves. Surely the College can boast of more than two first tenors?—or do these young people consider it below their dignity to sing in a chorus? The programme was completed by "Hervé Riel," a ballad for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra, by Mr. H. Walford Davies, an ex-scholar. It is one of the many works built after the model of Professor Stanford's "Revenge." Vigour, tunefulness, brightness, and clever descriptive writing for the orchestra are its chief characteristics. It cannot be said that Browning's rugged verse "yearns for musical expression," and to musically illustrate it might have puzzled a vastly more experienced composer than Mr. Davies. That he has done so well with such unpromising material, and produced such a spirited and, on the whole, effective piece, is an achievement of which he may justly be proud. Professor Stanford conducted.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.

Dr. Hubert Parry's Lectures on "Idealism and Realism in Music" attracted large audiences, on the first three Saturday afternoons of last month, to the Royal Institution. Idealism and Realism were, the lecturer said, so variously understood that the matter could best be tested by watching the instinct of artistic humanity while developing its resources unconsciously under the influence of its love for what was beautiful and what was consistent with the conditions which artistic instinct recognised as satisfactory in any particular form. The organisation of the material of art had proceeded for hundreds of years without the men who were organising it being the least conscious of what they were doing. No thought of artistic progress entered their heads; they acted on impulse, but the tendency of their efforts was always constant in its main direction, despite occasional aberrations and experimental deviations from the uniform course. They aimed at ideal art as a state in which all the resources which artists required should be perfectly developed and organised. Indeed, ideal art might be defined as that art which was perfectly organised to express the thought of the artist in terms which were most completely adapted to its conditions. From the very beginning of things to the present day there had been no pause in the endeavour to improve and enlarge the resources of art. We could trace the influence of the predisposition of different nations, giving rise to various schools of music—as in the leaning of the Italian towards beauty of sound, the inclination of the Netherlander towards subtleties of ingenious intellectual character, and the English proclivity towards breezy-spring-morning-like freshness of definition. With Mozart and Haydn the study of design became predominant. The energy with which they devoted themselves to the interest of absolute music—the music of the sonata, the symphony, the quartet—led them farther and farther away from the neighbourhood in which the possibility of any realistic influence could come to them. Beethoven, with his passionate humanity, changed men's attitude, even towards pure instrumental music. From the first the element of emotion was perceptible in his most characteristic work. On the heels of this new influence followed the desire to identify the particular phase of thought, and very soon the formula of dramatic music began to make its appearance in abstract instrumental works. Passages of passionate recitative were introduced into pianoforte sonatas, and imitations of human utterances were attempted, such as sighs, sobs, and the like. To the susceptible poetic temperament, the romantic period of music would seem, of all others, the most ideal; and no doubt it was a period in which ideas were very much insisted upon. Pieces provided with a programme and a name excited the interest of people whose knowledge of, and sympathy with the art seemed to be too limited for it to give them pleasure, however beautiful the composer's work might be in itself. Reviewing the mass of music that had been written during two hundred years, it might well be asked how it was that generation after generation of men should have expended this portentous amount of ingenuity upon an art so evanescent as music, and what it was that prompted men to devote the little span of life allotted to them to the thankless task of endeavouring to promote the progress of art. The truth was that the born poet and the born artist, worship as they might the achievements of their artistic heroes, felt that even the greatest giant had not covered all the ground, and that there was some beauty, some thought, which had yet to be expressed. The reverent critic hesitated to couple the names of Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven with the possibility of imperfection; but there were moments when the great ones talked prose, and such moments were the opportunities of the aspiring poet. Apart from this there were gaps left by the greatest writers which the lesser geniuses might justly feel impelled to fill. Chopin was not great in the same sense as Beethoven, but he did work which Beethoven could not have done if he had tried, and it was work that was eminently worth doing. This was as much as to say that even Beethoven had not completed the circuit of musical art, but had left something over for lesser men to achieve, and that they could yet develop art in particular branches.. It had frequently happened that the composer's knowledge or his instinct had been at fault, which had led him to devise realism in order to hide his helplessness from the listener by an appeal to his associations. This, of course, was not the invariable origin of realistic experiments, for realism was as variable in degree and in kind as the nature of a composer. There was the realism which tried to produce the counterpart of direct vocal expression in musical terms, such as a howl, shriek, sob, or sigh. Even the contour of a melodic phrase might be admitted into the category of modified realism and sometimes had produced admirable and convincing effects. But there was a borderland in realism where it was as difficult to draw the line as between the animal and vegetable kingdom. Some of the familiar progressions found in Beethoven's and Wagner's music might be regarded as a kind of realism. So might be also classed the Rossinian crescendi, which went on whirling for several pages with no more musical sense than the gallop of a horse or the rhythmic thud of a steam engine, but which, by persistency and increasing loudness, engendered a sort of mad frenzy in the unsophisticated mind. All these things partook of realism, but in most of these cases the realism was so far in the background that the hearer was scarcely conscious of it. A stage nearer recognisable realism was attained when the music had undoubted relevancy to the text or programme. A composer could hardly write anything now which referred to the sea without suggesting the rolling of the waves pictorially on the paper as well as to the ear. Instances of other accepted realistic forms made use of by Handel, Beethoven, and Wagner would occur to every lover of music. Such devices were very helpful to the composer who, by their means, was left more free to express what he desired to say. In all these devices the musical expression, however, was of the ideal order. The higher qualities of melody, harmony, and modulation fulfilled their due functions, the realistic element merely suffused them with a sort of flavour which called up associations in the mind of the hearer. That was to say, the musical word and its artistic presentment were primary, and of sufficient artistic and æsthetic value to justify the employment of realism as a pure extra or matter of supererogation. Realistic aids came as an afterthought to those who knew how to use them for ideal ends, but as an immature thought to those who did not. The early masters of the choral epoch sought out their improvements in the desire to attain more and more beautiful or more interesting effects for voices in combination. These composers began with the most innocent intentions conceivable, and in almost absolute belief in mere declamation supported by unadorned succession of chords; when they began to develop, which they did very rapidly, their sole desire was to intensify dramatic expression and not to develop realism. In their endeavours to secure dramatic intensity they were often led into extravagance and absurdity. Their artistic resources being inadequate to the realisation of their ambition, they were ultimately driven to realism to fill up the deficiencies of their craftsmanship. Purcell in such respect was a splendid sinner. He tried to fix the thought of the moment by a decisive type of figure which resembled the thing referred to by the words. Purcell was, however, by no means limited to such devices for conveying his meaning. His mastery of harmony was much greater than that of any other composer of his century, and he often resorted to ways of impressing his point which were in the highest degree appropriate to his art and truly idealistic.

The lecturer's remarks were admirably illustrated by a number of examples, which were sung by the Countess Valda Gleichen, the Misses Morfydd Williams and A. Fraser Shaw, and Mr. Emlyn Davies, who were accompanied by the lecturer. The excerpts comprised the opening scene from Peri's "Euridice," performed in 1600 at the famous wedding festivities of Henry IV.; the opening of the first oratorio, "The Soul and the Body," by Cavaliere; a song from Caccini's "Nuove Musiche"; "The Lament of Ariadne," by Monteverde; an excerpt from Cavalli's "Il Giasone"; another from Schütz's "Resurrectione"; the quarrel scene between the two women in Cesti's (or perhaps Carissimi's) "Solomon," and Purcell's "Twice two hundred deities."

Want of space necessitates the report of the remaining Lectures being held over until next month.

GRESHAM LECTURES.

Professor Bridge concluded, on January 31, his winter series of Lectures in connection with Gresham College, in the great Hall of the City of London School. At the first of the series the Professor took for his subject the "Early life and organ music of J. S. Bach." In a previous Lecture the career of this master had been traced to his acceptance of the important position of organist to St. Blasius Church at Mühlhausen. After staying a year at Mühlhausen, Bach was appointed Chamber Musician to the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar. Bach's move to Weimar marked one of the most important periods of his life. He was in a more settled position and he gained wider experience from his duties as court musician. The Grand Duke was a man of very striking personality, of very strong religious tendencies, but also, what was rare in those days, of liberal views. There was an impression that the eight little Preludes and Fugues were amongst the earliest works of the great master; but although they contained but few technical difficulties, their writing showed advanced knowledge of form. Two interesting evidences pointed to their having been written during the early Weimar period; one was that they retained the influence of the northern masters, and the other was the entry of the pedal merely to fill up the harmony, and not to bring in some portion of the fugue proper, which Bach never did after his first years at Weimar. The Toccata in D minor also bore the stamp of the northern school, and particularly that branch of it represented by the man Bach so much honoured, Buxtehude. The Prelude and Fugue in D had been described by Spitta as "one of the most dazzlingly beautiful of all the organ works." This also showed the influence of Buxtehude, particularly of that composer's Fugue in F major. Bach, however, by no means confined his studies to the music of the great northern masters, but was also thoroughly acquainted with the works of the chief Italian writers, especially those of Frescobaldi. The fugue form in Italy had grown out of the Canzona, and Bach's fine Canzona in D minor was an interesting evidence of the thoroughness of his Italian studies. Several of the works above-mentioned were excellently rendered by Mr. W. G. Alcock on the organ in the North gallery of the hall.

The following Lecture appealed to antiquaries, its title being "Musical Archives of Westminster Abbey." It appeared that Mr. Scott, of the MS. department of the British Museum, had been engaged in exploring and classifying the contents of the muniment room of the Abbey for the Dean and Chapter. Such an opportunity for research was not to be lost, and the Professor confessed to have spent during the last few months some delightful hours amidst the relics of the past. An interesting description was given of the muniment room, which is situated on the western side of the South transept, and is gained by a turret stairway from the cloisters. It is approached by an ante-room, which bore traces of having been at one time occupied, and might, the Professor said, have been a secret chamber of the Jacobite Atterbury. Then came a screen, on which figured a hart, the crest of Richard II., and behind this were the muniments of the Abbey. Amongst the many priceless documents was a memorandum book of Caxton, containing his autograph, and several receipts of organ-builders, hitherto unknown. There were two bills from John Howe for "mending and tuning the organs" in the Abbey in the first year of Queen Elizabeth's reign. One of these organs had previously stood in Henry VII.'s Chapel, where, doubtless, in the reign of Queen Mary, it had been used for the celebration of the Mass. Another bill, dated March 3, 1605, was signed by John Pendleton, and was for tuning and repairing the organ for the funeral of the daughter of James I. Three generations of Dallams seem to have been employed on behalf of the organ. Thomas Dallam was the organ-builder who took out an instrument to the Sultan of Turkey as a present from Queen Elizabeth. There was a receipt from one Burwood, concerning whom a letter had been found from Orlando Gibbons in which the latter said: "I know this bill to be very reasonable, for I have already cut him off ten shillings." As the whole amount was only twenty shillings and sixpence, it would seem that Gibbons must have been a keen man of business. A very interesting point was raised by a document dated 1645, containing the names of those of the choir who had "continued in town and taken the covenant." Several receipts had also been discovered from which it would appear that certain members of the choir had continued to draw their salaries during the Commonwealth, and as they would hardly have been paid for doing nothing, it would seem that the choir had not been disbanded during this period, as commonly supposed. The Professor had written to Professor Gardener on this matter, but the latter had been unable to throw any light on the subject, as he knew of no instance in which singing men had been retained in a Presbyterian church, as the Abbey was in 1645. Another curious paper was an account sent in, in 1704, by one Giles Jones, for £5 13s. 4d. for ringing the bells on certain national events. Several of Marlborough's victories were mentioned. The scale of remuneration appeared to have been measured by the importance of the victory. Amongst the entries was "For ringing for the taking of Gibraltar, 6s. 8d." The name of Roger Purcell had been found on two bills, once for work done in 1626, and again as the name of the bailiff of a farmer named Giles, in Huntingdonshire, who leased Abbey lands. This might possibly point to the origin of the connection of the Purcells with the Abbey. Receipts from sackbut and cornet players in the Abbey services had also been discovered. The sackbut was a sliding trumpet, a sort of trombone, and the old cornet was a plain wooden instrument, something like a primitive clarinet, but with a cup-shaped mouthpiece.

The illustrations at this Lecture included a solo played by Mr. W. H. Blandford on the last-named instrument, the tone of which was more distinctive than pleasing. Two songs by Purcell were also sung, one by an Abbey choirboy and the other by Mr. Fell. Some organ pieces were also played by Mr. W. J. Winter.

The two concluding Lectures were devoted to Franz Schubert, his instrumental works being considered at the first and his songs at the second. The Professor also had much to say concerning the character and surroundings of this composer. A graphic picture was drawn of the young musician's early struggles, of his duties as schoolmaster, and his uncontrollable impulse to compose on every possible occasion. Pleasing reference was also made to his lovable nature and the faithfulness of friends, such as Spaun, the Grob family, and Franz von Schober, to all of whom Schubert was much indebted. In one sense, the Professor said, it was unfortunate that the young composer in his early years had not been subjected to more searching criticisms than that of his companions and music-master. The Professor yielded to none in admiration for his marvellous powers of imagination; but it was an undoubted fact that Schubert's instrumental works lacked conciseness of design. Amongst his most noteworthy characteristics was his wonderful use of modulation as a means of expression. This feature pervaded all his compositions, but was most effectively employed in his songs. In his accompaniments Schubert was absolutely unsurpassable. Some of them were very elaborate and demanded considerable technical ability on the part of the pianist, but their elaboration was never mere ornamentation. Whenever it was not demanded by the text the accompaniment was immediately subordinated to the voice part. Schubert's music was only half appreciated in England—we were contented to listen to a few of his compositions and to take the others on trust; but to any who might be encouraged by these remarks to make a real study of his works, the Professor promised a most liberal reward; for as Sir George Grove had truly said: "No one ever rose from hearing a piece by Schubert without being benefited."

Much interest was attached to the illustrations, which at the first of the Schubert Lectures comprised the String Quartet in A minor, effectively rendered by Miss Zoë Pyne, Miss Lilian Wright, Mr. P. Kearne, and Mr. T. Werge; and some pianoforte pieces, including the Rondeau Brillante in B minor, which were excellently played by Miss A. D. Spiller. At the final Lecture an admirable selection of the composer's songs was most expressively sung by Miss Elvira Gambogi and Mr. Daniel Price.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

An unusually large audience assembled at the monthly meeting of the Musical Association, held on the 11th ult., when Mr. F. Cunningham Woods read a paper of great antiquarian interest, entitled "A brief survey of the dances popular in England during the eighteenth century." The lecturer had gone to the best of all sources for the material of his discourse, by study and comparison of the numerous volumes of dances published in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In this he had been materially assisted by Mr. Taphouse, who, on this occasion, had lent a remarkable, and it may be said unique, collection of these dance books, and also many fine specimens of some of the instruments upon which the measures were commonly played. The lecturer started from the restoration of the Stuarts, when dancing became the popular amusement of every class. The majority of the dance tunes were traditional airs which had been handed down by itinerant players who earned their living at country fairs, maypole dances, &c. The titles of some of these dances referred to a certain locality or county; but in other instances some of the titles were difficult to account for, such as "The penitent Nun," "The maid peeped out of the window; or, the Fryer in the well," "The shaking of sheets." Other titles, such as "The Buttock of Beef," "Rattling roaring Willie," "Shake her well," and "The Devil's dead," indicated that mirth and jollity were insisted upon where wisdom and sobriety might possibly be absent. The fashionable dances, such as those specially arranged by Mr. Isaac to Mr. Paisible's tunes, and published by Wright, were in many cases named after some titled person or memorable occasion. In all early "Dancing Masters" the treble part only was given, in some later editions the bass was also found; but an inner part in any printed edition was very rarely met with. Most of the engravings, however, represented the dances being played by several musicians. The interesting question therefore arose, were the rest of the band playing from memory or were they extemporising? Great variety was evidently practised in the different dances, and some of the directions which were appended as foot-notes to the dances were very quaint. In a country dance called "The green garden," after bidding the couples "to set and turn," we read as follows: "The first man, shake his own woman by the hand, then the second, then the third by one hand, then by the other, kiss her twice and turn her. Shake her by the hand, then the other, kiss her twice and turn her; this as before," &c. The Rigadoon, Passepied, Jigg, and Bourrée took the place of the Pavane, Sarabande, and Courante of a previous age, and these dances in their turn gave way to the Minuet, which towards the close of the century appeared to have become the most fashionable dance. To the musician it was interesting to notice how the development of the minuet increased in importance: they became longer and more melodious. It was also noticeable in the later books that the minuet had rivals in dance music of quicker tempo. Thus Wright's "Compleat Selection of Celebrated Country Dances," which appeared about 1730, contained a "Hornpipe," "Rant," "Maggot," "The new Dutch Skipper," and a "Reel," which were evidently taking the place of the French Minuet. It might be inferred that the Scotch element was firmly established in favour towards the latter part of the eighteenth century, from the fact that Walsh published no less than nine books of Caledonian dances in the year 1765. Comparison of Wright's edition of about 1730 with that of Walsh in 1765 indicated that at the latter period dancing rather than posturing of the various couples was insisted upon. The lecturer thought that the dance tunes had greatly influenced the songs of the period—that when a dance tune had become popular it was utilised by song-writers. Mr. W. H. Cummings, however, who occupied the chair in the unavoidable absence of Dr. Hubert Parry, thought otherwise—that the tunes of popular songs, as a rule, were turned into dances, although, of course, in some instances the reverse had been the case. With regard to the harmonisation of the dances, Mr. Cummings considered that they were commonly extemporised by the players, which, considering the simple character of the tunes, would not be difficult to do. Several other interesting points were also discussed. The musical illustrations were given by Miss Taphouse on the pianoforte, and by Mr. J. Finn on the flute and on a very fine ivory recorder.

THE PLAIN SONG AND MEDIÆVAL SOCIETY.

At a meeting of the Plain Song and Mediæval Society, held on January 24 in the Chapter House of St. Paul's Cathedral, the Rev. Howard Frere discoursed pleasantly for the best part of an hour on the origin and development of Psalmody. Mr. Frere is one of those men who delight to endow the past with the interest of the present, to revivify fossilised remains, and above all things to show us their origin. No nation, Mr. Frere said, but the English seemed to be able to endure the hideous roar commonly heard in the majority of our churches. Thus the early Christians, according to Mr. Frere, adopted a note on which to speak their responses. To get this note the voice would have to rise or fall as the case might be until it was pitched, then an effort would be made to hold it, and finally the desire to accentuate certain words and the end of sentences would cause deviation from the note spoken on. Thus the origin of monotone and inflections was explained, and, it must be admitted, with some degree of plausibility. Certain it is that a large part of the services of the early Church was in simply inflected monotone. We have the authority of St. Augustine, who said that "in the time of St. Athanasius the Psalms were rendered in a fashion more like reading than singing." From the monotone grew a responsical form in which the priest was answered by trained men and boys, and a short refrain or chorus was allotted to the congregation. This method became very popular, until it was desired to shorten the services, when the chorus portions were excised. Another development of the monotone was in the direction of ornamental figures; there being no harmonised choir-singing or organs; embellishment of the vocal part was, in fact, all that could be done. But before much progress had taken place, melody, as distinct from monotone, had invaded the Church. For a time the two streams, one having its source within and the other without the Church, ran side by side, but gradually they fraternised; the Psalm tones adapted themselves to the Antiphones, and the Antiphones fitted themselves to the Psalm tones. The efforts of St. Ambrose and others were well known, and the Psalms in consequence became generally rendered antiphonally. Mr. Frere was very hard upon the methods pursued in some churches to-day with regard to the responses, which were sung, he averred, in an elaborate manner, inconsistent with their character. On this question much doubtless could be said, but the examples of the responses of the early Church, as sung on this occasion by members of the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral, had a ring of sincerity in their simple progressions which made them very impressive. A remarkably dignified setting of the "Alma Redemptoris" was finely sung by Mr. R. E. Miles, and a "Salve Regina," rendered by Mr. Vernon Taylor, was an interesting specimen of early Church music. Other excerpts, in which Mr. George Stubbs and Mr. Howell as soloists took part with the choir, showed the gradual development of Church music, or, it might be said, the invasion of plain song by the art of the musician.

SOCIETY FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF FINE ARTS.

Mr. Henry F. Frost delivered a comprehensive discourse on "The Art Work of Richard Wagner," before a large gathering of the members and friends of the Society for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts, at a meeting held on the 6th ult., at 9, Conduit Street. Mr. Edgar F. Jacques, who occupied the chair, reminded the audience that at one time music was not classed as one of the fine arts, and that, even now, it would seem to be regarded in some journals as occupying a position by itself. Such a foolish distinction had never been recognised by this Society, and no subject could be more appropriate there than the art work of Wagner, for he, above all others, had recognised the intimate and vital connection between the Arts, tonal, poetical, and plastic.

Mr. Frost said he had been asked to speak upon Wagner and his works because he was told he had the subject at his finger-ends. This he admitted to be true, but such also could scarcely fail to be the case with many of the cultured audience before him. If such were the case, however, the lecturer imparted much interest to his extemporaneous remarks by detailing the reasons which, some quarter of a century ago, had led him to espouse the cause of Wagner at a time when the large majority of critics were dipping their pens in vinegar and gall. He exemplified how dangerous it was to prophesy unless you knew by quoting the opinion expressed by friends and foes alike in 1876, when the Bayreuth Theatre was opened, that "Der Ring des Nibelungen" could only be performed at Bayreuth and that the music was utterly unsuited to the concert-room. The essential differences between the old opera form and music-drama were clearly described, as were also the principles upon which Wagner worked. The underlying idea of redemption by self-sacrifice which pervaded all Wagner's riper works was shown by terse and masterly epitomes of his later dramatic productions. Incidentally the mistake into which many had fallen in supposing that Wagner attributed any supernatural power to the love potion in "Tristan und Isolde" was exposed by quotation of Isolde's own words in the second act; and the erroneous conclusion confuted that Isolde was married to King Mark when she made the appointment to meet Tristan in the second act, for in the last act King Mark said he had come "to mate Isolde with the man whom most I loved." Mr. Frost combated the idea that Wagner was an atheist, a free-thinker, or a disciple of Schopenhauer, as had been alleged. No atheist would speak of "Our Lord" as Wagner had done in his description of the Prelude to "Lohengrin," and still stronger evidence of Wagner being religious at heart was adduced by quotations from Hans von Wolzogen's "Recollections of Wagner." The discourse, which was pleasantly interspersed by vocal excerpts effectively sung by Miss Frost and Mr. G. R. Betjemann, and pianoforte illustrations by Mr. J. S. Shedlock, was concluded by some valuable hints to those who meditated making the pilgrimage for the first time to the Wagnerian Meeca.

FUNERAL SERVICE OF SIR JOSEPH BARNBY.

It was meet that the art to which Sir Joseph Barnby had devoted his life should speak with its utmost eloquence at his obsequies, and if true music begins where speech fails, then assuredly were expressions of deepest regret and appreciative testimony poured forth in generous abundance on the 4th ult., in St. Paul's Cathedral. The congregation was a remarkably representative one. The Queen was represented by Mr. Raglan G. Somerset, the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha (president of the Royal Choral Society) by Mr. G. F. Bambridge, his secretary, and the Lord Mayor by Sir Simeon Stuart, the City Marshal.

Representatives also attended from the Royal Choral

Society, the Royal Society of Musicians, the Philharmonic Society, the Incorporated Society of Musicians, the Royal Academy of Music, the Royal College of Music, the Guildhall School of Music, the London Academy of Music, the Royal Military College of Music, Kneller Hall, the Royal College of Organists, Trinity College, the London Organ School, the Highbury Philharmonic Society, the Tonic Sol-fa College, the Association of North London Choirs, the Sunday Philharmonic Union, the Sunday Society, the Dulwich Choral Society, the Peckham Tonic Sol-fa Choir, the Holloway College of Music, Beckenham Choral Society, Yorkshiremen in London, the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, the Stock Exchange Amateur Orchestral Society, the Strolling Players' Amateur Society, the Cardiff Musical Festival Committee, Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society, the Cardiff Musical Society, Bradford Old Choral Society, Bedford Musical Society, Bournemouth Festival Committee, Liverpool Central College of Music, Cheltenham Festival Society, the Wolverhampton Stave Club, and the Wolverhampton Quaver Club. The deputation from Eton College consisted of sixteen gentlemen headed by the Provost and Dr. C. Harford Lloyd (the Precentor). The representation from the Guildhall School of Music comprised twenty-five professors. Sir John Stainer was represented by his son, Mr. J. F. R. Stainer, and Mr. Santley, also prevented from attending, was represented by his son. Mr. Frederic H. Cowen was unable to attend owing to enforced absence from town. The pall-bearers were the Provost of Eton (Dr. Hornby), the Earl of Kilmorey (representing the Royal Choral Society), Sir Arthur Sullivan, Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Mr. T. Brooke Hitching (chairman of the Music Committee of the Corporation), Professor J. F. Bridge, Mr. Alfred H. Littleton, and Mr. Hilton Carter (secretary of the Guildhall School of Music). The mourners present were Lady Barnby, Miss Muriel Barnby, Masters Laurence and Charles Barnby, Colonel Silverthorne, Miss Silverthorne, Mrs. Dawson (sister), Miss Hilda Barnby, Miss Enid Barnby (nieces), Mrs. Buckley, Mr. W. Simpson, Mr. J. B. Morgan, Dr. F. Pierce, Dr. Austin, Mr. J. Berwick Orgill, Mr. Crawshay, Mr. and Mrs. Visetti, Mr. James Barnby (brother), Mr. Sydney Barnby (nephew), Mrs. Sydney Barnby, Mr. W. H. Holmes, Mr. T. R. Barnby, Mr. W. J. Barnby, Mr. Harry Barnby, and Mr. H. T. Barnby (nephews).

The North transept and a portion of the nave were reserved for 1,250 students of the Guildhall School of Music, and the South transept for the choir and orchestra of the Royal Choral Society. As the solemn strains of Chopin's Funeral March, played by Dr. Martin, died away, the officiating clergy and choir moved down to the great West door and met the funeral procession, which was conducted to the chancel while the opening sentences of the Burial Service were chanted to music by Dr. Croft. The 90th Psalm was sung to a chant by the Rev. F. A. J. Hervey, rector of Sandringham, and the reading of the lesson was followed by Dr. Dykes's setting of the well-known hymn "Now the labourer's task is o'er." The anthem was "Happy and blest," from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," which was chosen because Sir Joseph had once said, speaking to his celebrated choir at an Albert Hall rehearsal, "This is what I should like to be sung over me when I die. Sing it as well, and I shall be happy"—words that must have come back with vivid significance to the members of the choir who were present and to whom they had been addressed. The most touching portion of the service, however, was the singing of "Sleep thy last sleep," from a series of "Original Tunes to Popular Hymns for Use in Church and Home," composed by the deceased musician. This setting is a fine example of the composer's peculiar power of expression by subtle changes of harmony, and on this occasion it was sung with an intensity of feeling that brought tears to "the eyes of bearded men." Then the procession was re-formed, and passed out from amongst the silent multitude while Handel's Dead March in "Saul" was played on the organ. No music was heard at the grave at Norwood Cemetery, but hundreds of wreaths and thousands of spectators bore silent testimony to the wide esteem the musician's life-work had excited.

REVIEWS.

The Communion Service. Set to music in the key of A major. By George C. Martin, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Church music at the present day is in great demand; this we see from the number of services and anthems which are constantly being published. Dr. Martin's music is clever; it is also thoroughly modern in character—i.e., the chromatic element enters largely into it; and it is full of devout feeling. This Service may, indeed, be regarded as of exceptional merit. Already the short "Kyrie," with its calm, plaintive strains, creates interest and expectation. Throughout the "Credo," and, indeed, throughout the Service, the organ part is one of striking independence and importance. It not only colours the words, but occasionally reveals more fully their meaning: the bold phrase in the opening Symphony, in reference to the "Credo in unum Deum," is heard at the words "one Lord Jesus Christ," and once again when reference is made to the Holy Ghost; the mystery of the Trinity is thus expounded in tones, and, further, unity of musical feeling thereby promoted. There are many points worthy of mention in this "Credo": the clever and often striking harmonies, the vivid dynamic contrasts, and various touches of realism with point and yet no exaggeration. The "Sanctus" is dignified, especially the opening and closing sections; the opening phrase seems related, though, perhaps, only distantly, to subject-matter in the previous number. The "Benedictus," for solo voice and chorus, is smooth and flowing; and in the "Agnus Dei" excellent results are obtained by very simple means. The "Gloria in Excelsis" begins in vigorous and characteristic fashion; there is great variety of rhythm in this impressive number. The fine passage for bass solo deserves particular notice; also the "Have mercy" section which follows, and in which points of imitation are introduced with little show, yet great effect. The latter part is fugal, and brings the Service to an effective close.

Ten Short and Melodious Studies for the Pianoforte. Op. 30. Twelve Poetical Studies for the Pianoforte. Op. 31. By Graham P. Moore. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

The ten Studies are "composed specially for the development of touch and phrasing" and are excellently designed to achieve their purpose. Athough termed Studies, several of them would make bright and effective little pieces for the drawing-room.

In a brief preface to the twelve Studies the author says: "The object of this work is not so much to further general technical facility as to provide a means of acquiring a tasteful and artistic style in the performance of melody combined with varied forms of accompaniment." This laudable aim has been kept well in view, and there are few amateur pianists but will derive benefit and enjoyment from playing over Mr. Moore's tasteful and clever sketches.

Albumblatt. Reigen. For the Pianoforte. By Maughan Barnett. [Edwin Ashdown.]

The composer of these bright little pieces has something to say and moreover expresses it in workmanlike and effective manner. The "Albumblatt," in particular, possesses a piquant individuality that renders it very attractive. The "Reigen" would form a good exercise for neat fingering.

Melody in E flat. For the Pianoforte. By Edward German. [Edwin Ashdown.]

An expressive and graceful melody is here treated in Mozart-like fashion. Although easy to play, it calls for the artistic musician to do it justice.

Mass in E flat. Op. 55. By Henry J. Wood. [Charles Tuckwood.]

This is a devotional setting of the Mass, evidently designed and admirably suitable for ordinary use in Roman Catholic churches. The music is highly melodious, of a broad and dignified character, and will present no difficulties to a fairly capable choir.

The Musical Educator. A library of Musical Instruction by eminent Specialists. Edited by John Greig, Mus. Doc., Oxon. [Edinburgh: T. C. and E. C. Jack.]

This work, now in course of publication, will be completed in five volumes or seventeen parts. It is designed on the plan of the well-known "Popular Educator" of Messrs. Cassell and Co.—that is to say, several subjects are begun in the earlier volumes or parts and completed in succeeding ones. In the case of a publication issued weekly or monthly this method may have advantages, inasmuch as the learner is supplied each time with just enough for one lesson in each subject; but, when completed, such works are far less convenient than those in which each department has a volume to itself. This, however, is a matter of taste. With regard to the manner in which the plan in question has been carried out in the first two volumes—the only ones yet issued—hearty praise must be awarded to all concerned. The complete work will include courses of lessons in twenty subjects, and of these twelve are begun in the two volumes under notice. These deal respectively with voice culture, the pianoforte, violin, organ, harmonium, orchestral instruments, musical history, rudiments, harmony and counterpoint, form and analysis, choir training and conducting, and musical terms. The authors are Messrs. J. Sneddon, W. Townsend, W. Daly, J. S. Anderson, J. C. Grieve, F. Laubach, W. Daly, jun., J. Robertson, and H. Hartley. All these gentlemen write clearly, convey correct information, and arrange their materials in conformity with modern lines of thought. Photogravures of musical celebrities and numerous engravings in the text form attractive and helpful features of the volumes, which are well printed on excellent paper and strongly bound. Among the articles still to come we are promised one "On the Characteristics of National Music"—author's name not stated. If this be well carried out it should be extremely valuable.

Organ Arrangements. Nos. 37 and 38. Edited by George C. Martin. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Both these numbers are important additions to this excellent series. The first is an arrangement for the modern organ, by Mr. W. Alcock, of Purcell's "Voluntary for double organ" in D minor, which was played and greatly admired on several occasions during the bi-centenary celebrations in November last, and notably at the memorable service in Westminster Abbey. It is true organ music, highly effective, without presenting any special difficulties, and should certainly be in the repertory of every patriotic organist. No. 38 makes greater demands on the executant. It is an arrangement, by Mr. Charles Macpherson, of the Finale from Tschaïkowsky's sixth Symphony, one of the most deeply impressive pieces of orchestral writing of modern times. The endeavour to reproduce on the organ the orchestral effects peculiar to the modern Russian school of music is a difficult task, and one which from its nature can, at the best, be but partially successful. Mr. Macpherson has, however, much knowledge and experience, and his work bears the stamp of earnestness and sound musicianship. Its success in execution will be proportionate to the dramatic perception and abilities of the organist and the resources of his instrument.

Novello's School Songs. Books 57 and 58. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Book 57 of this excellent series will doubtless meet with wide acceptance. It is unnecessary to say more than that it consists of the following songs: "Hear thou my weeping" ("Laschia ch' io pianga"), Handel; "My mother bids me bind my hair," Haydn; "To Chloe in sickness," W. S. Bennett; "Come, happy Spring" ("Caro mio ben"), Giordani: "Autumn Song," Mendelssohn; and "The Mermaid's Song," Haydn. Book 58 includes ten unison songs (Nos. 274 to 283), several of which are of a humorous character and are intended for younger singers than the examples forming Book 57. The composers are A. Scott Gatty, Thomas Murby, Arthur Richards, and Seymour Smith, all of whom have set the vivacious text in a melodious and simple manner. It should be added that each song can be had separately, and is furnished with the Tonic Sol-fa as well as the Staff notation.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Absam (Tyrol).—A committee has formed itself here charged with the collection of the necessary funds for the erection over the grave of Jacob Stainer, the "father of German violin makers," of a worthy memorial in place of the existing dilapidated stone slab. Stainer, who was born at Absam in 1621, died here, demented and in poverty, in 1683, and for many years past visitors to the grave have found it almost impossible to discover its whereabouts.

Bayreuth.—The importance as a musical centre which this little Bavarian town has acquired, since the existence here of the Festspielhaus, has been substantially recognised in the bequest by one of its leading citizens, Commerzien-Rath Roese, of the sum of 150,000 marks, to be expended in the erection here of a large concert hall. Plans by several eminent architects have already been received by the Municipality, and the building will be proceeded with at once.——The villa inhabited by the poet-composer during the earlier part of his sojourn here, and where he wrote the greater part of the score of "Götterdämmerung," has been bought by a wealthy German amateur, and will, with its adjoining park, be thrown open to the public during the Festspiele.

Berlin.—Under the title of "Hugo Wolf-Verein," a Society has been started here with the object of introducing to wider circles the songs by that composer, which, by their charm and originality, have already found many admirers here and elsewhere. Herr Wolf has just completed an opera, "Der Corregidor," which is to be brought out at the Royal Theatre.——At the sixth Symphony Concert of the Royal Orchestra last month, under Herr Weingartner's direction, Smetana's symphonic poem "Aus Böhmen's Hain und Flur," the first of a series of similar works published under the general title of "My Fatherland," obtained a first hearing. The truly poetic contents of the work, its clever polyphonic treatment of national themes and masterly handling of the orchestral resources, secured for it the warm appreciation of the audience. The same Concert included a new orchestral version of Weber's "Aufforderung zum Tanz," by Herr Weingartner, wherein the familiar themes have been paraphrased, subjected to certain contrapuntal devices and combinations, and the piece otherwise added to. The audience were delighted, and the performance had to be repeated. The composer, on the other hand, to whom the eminent conductor had thus extended the charity of his latter-day erudition, could he have been present, would scarcely have shared the delight.

Buda-Pesth.—The Philharmonic Society here will give a series of eight festival Concerts, in connection with the forthcoming "Millennium" Exhibition, to be conducted by eminent musicians. Six out of the series will be devoted exclusively to composers of Hungarian nationality.——A young artist, Bruno Granichstaedten, has recently attracted the attention of music-lovers both here and in Vienna to a considerable degree as the composer of a symphonic poem. "The Song of the Sea," a pianoforte quintet, and other compositions, and as a pianist. He is only sixteen years of age, and a pupil at the Vienna Conservatorium.

Cologne.—An important novelty at the Gürzenich Concert of January 28 was the performance of the symphony-oratorio "Christus," by the veteran Belgian composer, M. Adolphe Samuel, first produced about twelve months since at Ghent, where M. Samuel is Director of the Conservatoire. The work is divided into five parts, the first and second being purely orchestral, while in the remaining three the chorus takes an important share. Manifestly conceived under the influence of "Parsifal," with the subject of which it presents many points of contact, M. Samuel's "Christus" possesses nevertheless considerable independent merit, as was acknowledged both by the highly appreciatory attitude of a crowded audience and in the criticisms of the leading press organs. The performance, under Dr. Wüllner, was an excellent one, amongst those present being the Archbishop of Cologne, Cardinal Krementz, the composer himself (now in his seventy-third year), and M. Ysaye, who is preparing a performance of the work for one of his Brussels Concerts.

Copenhagen.—A new opera, entitled "Aucassin and Nicolette," by August Enna, the successful composer of "The Witch" and "Cleopatra," was brought out at the Royal Theatre on the 2nd ult., and received with much favour.

Dresden.—The Royal Conservatorium celebrated, on January 28, the fortieth anniversary of its foundation. The Institution was opened in 1856, under the direction of Ferdinand Tröstler, and occupies an honoured position amongst similar German establishments, its present director being Professor Eugen Krantz, with a staff of 102 professors, the number of its pupils exceeding nine hundred. The interesting anniversary was marked by a special Concert performance, in which professors and pupils took part, decorations being bestowed on some of the former by the King of Saxony, and a superb concert grand was presented to the Institution by Herr Blüthner, of Leipzig.——A young Norwegian vocalist, Fräulein Lalla Wiborg, gave a Recital here recently, and gained much favour with a variety of German and Norwegian Lieder, the latter including two songs by Grieg, expressly orchestrated for the singer by the Norwegian master.

Hanover.—The fourth of a series of grand Concerts, given in the Royal Opera House during the winter, took place here, on the 1st ult., in the presence of an overflowing audience. It included the performance by the orchestra (one of the best in Germany) of Berlioz's "Corsair" Overture and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Concert-meister Riller was the solo violinist, and played with exquisite taste and feeling Bruch's Concerto in G minor and other pieces, in all of which he obtained hearty and well earned applause.

Leipzig.—The excellent Leipziger Gesangverein, under the direction of Capellmeister Hans Sitt, signalised the twentieth anniversary of its foundation with a special Concert on the 9th ult., when Heinrich Zöllner's "Helden Requiem," an important work of mingled patriotic and deeply religious sentiment, obtained an excellent first hearing. The programme also included a choral work for male voices, "Hakon Jarl," by Dr. Carl Reinecke, the veteran composer conducting his own work, and also playing the solo part in Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat major, a specialty of his, in which he aroused the enthusiasm of his audience.——The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, under Herr Weingartner's direction, gave two Concerts at the Albert Halle, on the 11th and 12th ult., with immense success. This was the first appearance here of the Berlin artists, and is looked upon as an important event in the musical annals of the town.

Liegnitz.—A Musical Festival is to be held here for the first time, from the 24th to the 26th inst., under the direction of Herr Heidingsfeld, when Tinel's "Franciscus" is to be given twice; other numbers in the programme being Bruch's "Normannen Zug," portions of Cherubini's Missa Solemnis, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The Festival is to be of annual occurrence.

Madrid.—Herr Gustav Kogel, the able director of the Museum Concerts in Frankfort-on-Main, has been engaged to conduct a series of Concerts of the Sociedad de Conciertos in this capital during the present month.——The Royal Opera has been obliged, in the middle of the season, to close its doors on account of the financial difficulties of its director. A new director is, however, about to be appointed, with probably an increase in the amount of the government subvention.

Marienbad.—Out of a number of 160 candidates, the vacant conductorship of the excellent "Cur-Orchester" at this cosmopolitan resort has been conferred upon Herr Adalbert Schreyer, of Linz. He is a son of the late organist of Olmütz Cathedral, is an excellent pianist, and for the last thirteen years has rendered distinguished service in the capacity of Director of the Musik-Verein at Linz.

Mayence.—A new Symphony in B flat major, by Professor Friedrich Gernsheim, of Berlin, was produced here for the first time recently by the Municipal Orchestra, under the composer's direction, and most favourably received.

Meiningen.—The first Subscription Concert of the season, given by the Court Orchestra last month, included a new (manuscript) Symphony, with chorus, from the pen of Herr Hans von Bronsart. The work is chiefly of the descriptive order, bearing the suggestive title "In the Alps," and proved not unworthy of its theme, both as regards poetic sentiment and skilful orchestral painting. It met with an enthusiastic reception.

Milan.—Baron Alberto Franchetti, the composer of "Asrael," is just now engaged upon a new operatic score, "Maria Egiziaca," the libretto by Signor Fontana, which is to be brought out here next season.

Moscow.—M. Alexandre Glazounoff, one of the most gifted of the younger school of Russian musicians, has been officially charged with the composition of a festal cantata, to be performed here in May next in connection with the coronation of the Czar.

Munich.—Herr Hermann Gura, son of the eminent baritone of the Royal Opera, has made a most successful début here in some of the lighter parts associated with his father's repertory, and has been forthwith engaged for a period of three years. Both vocally and histrionically, the young artist gives the highest promise.

Nuremberg.—A one-act music-drama, by Herr F. von Woyrsch, entitled "Wikingerfahrt," met with very good success on its first performance here, on January 26. The composer has drawn the interesting subject of his libretto from the old Icelandic Gunnlang-Saga, and his score is both melodious and dramatically effective.

Prague.—A young vocalist, Mdlle. Otilie Dvorák, made her début here recently as Elisabeth in "Tannhäuser," Elsa in "Lohengrin," and Tatjana in Tschaïkowsky's "Eugène Onégin," with complete success. The lady is in possession of a well-trained and most sympathetic soprano voice, and, having regard to her youth, a remarkable knowledge of the stage. She has been definitely engaged at the National Opera.——Zdenko Fibich's latest operatic work, "Hedy," the libretto of which is founded upon an episode in Byron's "Don Juan," was brought out at the National Theatre, on the 12th ult., under the direction of Herr A. Czech, with much success.——Antonin Dvorák has recently completed a violoncello concerto, which is about to be published.

Schwerin.—A monument is to be erected in the market-place here to Friedrich von Flotow, the composer of "Martha."——A one-act music-drama, entitled "Helge's Erwachen," by Herr Alfred Lorenz, met with considerable success on its first performance at the Court Theatre on the 5th ult.

Turin.—A professorship for musical history and æsthetics has been instituted at the Liceo Musicale in this town, the first occupant of the chair being Signor Villanis, a lawyer by profession, and well known as a musical critic.——Puccini's new opera, "La Bohème," was brought out at the Teatro Regio on the 1st ult., and very well received. The music, by no means deficient in merit, is, however, hampered by an ineffective libretto; Murger's "La vie de Bohème," upon which it is founded, being in fact hardly suitable for the book of an opera.——In view of the recent success of "Götterdämmerung" at the Regio, the undergraduates of the University here are about to perform a parody of this, the final part of the Tetralogy. Delicately handled, the affair should prove very funny.

Vienna.—A committee has constituted itself here, with branches in Berlin and Paris, having for its object the performance on purely artistic—i.e., non-commercial—lines of the lyrical drama "Gœa," by the composer of "The seven cardinal sins," Adalbert von Goldschmidt, a work described as combining, in a special manner, the art of music with the sister arts, and the performance of which, in the ordinary way, "the present condition of the stage does not permit." An appeal has been published for aid in the undertaking, bearing the signatures of thirty-eight representative artists, literary men, and dilettanti, including those of Sudermann, Zola, Alphonse Daudet, Maeterlinck, Begas, Tilgner, Lamoureux, Moszkowski, Johann Strauss, and Leoncavallo. Shares of five hundred florins apiece are being issued by the committee, and, according to the Neue Freie Presse, representations of "Gœa" are to be given throughout Germany, commencing with Berlin.——An interesting Concert was announced to be given, on the 21st ult., under the direction of Herren Hans Richter and W. Jahn, by the Haydn Society, to signalise the 125th anniversary of the existence of that Institution. It was founded in 1771 by Florian Gassmann, under the style of "Tonkünstler Societät," its performances being given in aid of widows and orphans of Viennese musicians, and in 1862 it adopted the name of "Haydn." The programme of the Concert in question consisted of works by that master (for thirty years a member of the Society) and of an overture written by the founder, M. van Dyck being amongst the solo vocalists.

Worms.—This town, famous of old for its association with the heroes of the Nibelungen Lied, and many an historical association besides, has hitherto enjoyed the additional distinction of being the only German town of any importance where "Lohengrin" had never yet been performed, the one of all Wagner's works which has enjoyed enormous popularity in the fatherland for the last thirty years at least. However, the chivalrous Knight of the Swan made his appearance at length on the boards of the Stadt-Theater last month, and if the town has thus forfeited a questionable distinction, its music-loving inhabitants are the gainers thereby.

MUSIC IN BELFAST.

On January 25 the Ulster Hall was crowded in every part, the Concert being under the patronage of Lord and Lady Arthur Hill, who were present. More than ordinary interest was attached to the Concert from the announcement that the first half of the programme would be devoted to selections from the compositions of Lady Arthur Hill. Many of her prettiest songs and duets were sung by Madame Louis Mantell, Miss Leila Varsittart, Mr. Louis Mantell, and Mr. Dilworth Buxton. Lady Arthur Hill's delightful anthem "O Perfect Love" came in for a perfect storm of applause and had to be repeated. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, and the same artists were assisted by Miss Lucie Agnese Gallagher, Mr. Edmund Lee, and Mr. Thomas Ely. Mr. Allan F. Parker presided at the pianoforte with taste and judgment.

The Philharmonic Society gave its third Subscription Concert on the 13th ult. In consequence of the performance, on the 20th inst., of Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust," the members of the Society took little part in the Concert under notice, merely singing the chorus from "Samson" ("Fixed in his everlasting seat") and Eaton Faning's part-song "The Vikings." The feature of this Concert was the fine glee singing of the Meister Glee Singers. Madame Clara Samuell was the only lady vocalist, Miss Pauline Sant Angelo (solo pianist), and Mons. Hans Brousil (solo violoncello). Mr. F. Koeller conducted, as usual.

On the 14th ult. a Concert was given in the Ulster Hall in which the band of the North Staffordshire Regiment took part. In addition to the orchestral selections, the part-singing of the men was loudly encored. It is almost a pity that the study of male part-songs in regimental bands throughout the country is not more general, the facilities for practising them being so great. At this Concert Miss M. E. Williams, a young Welsh vocalist, created a most favourable impression by her singing.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

Messrs. Harrison's third Concert of the season, like its predecessors, proved a complete success in every way. Years of experience have shown our local impresarii that their programmes must be framed on cosmopolitan and liberal lines in order to please all tastes, and that the artistic personnel they introduce must be of the highest standing. Herein we find the true key-note of their uninterrupted successful enterprises. The principals at the third Concert were Miss Evangeline Florence, Madame Alice Gomez, Mr. Ben Davies, the Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir, Miss Ethel Barns (violin), Mdlle. Ten Have (pianoforte), and Mr. Speaight (accompanist).

Two Pianoforte Recitals were given by Mr. de Greef, the eminent Belgian pianist. The first only drew a small audience, but the second was crowded, completely filling the Masonic Hall, in which the Recitals were given. The programmes were models of artistic worth, and included examples by Bach, Mozart, Handel, Beethoven, Schumann, Scarlatti, Daquin, Chopin, Liszt, &c. Mr. De Greef's interpretation of Beethoven is much in the manner of the late Dr. Hans von Bülow, full of character and ideal conception. One of his best efforts was the magnificent rendering of Chopin's First Scherzo in B minor (Op. 20). The French have given it the title of "Le Banquet Infernal," and I must confess that Mr. de Greef fully realised that meaning.

An excellent Concert was given in the Town Hall in aid of the Railway Servants' Orphanage, Derby. Part of the orchestra was occupied by one hundred children from the Orphanage, who contributed several part-songs, given in a very effective manner under their master, Mr. Charles Rowley. Railway guardsmen, foremen, and officials in uniform acted as stewards, presenting quite an unusual sight in our large hall. Madame Marie Duma was the prima donna, whose vocal efforts were greatly appreciated and applauded by the crowded assembly. The other artists included Miss Janetta Frazier, Madame Hooton, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. William Evans. The Birmingham Flute Quartet contributed several concerted pieces, and Mr. George Halliley acted as accompanist.

The Midland Musical Society's fifty-second Artisans' Concert, under the direction of Mr. H. M. Stevenson, was well attended, and proved one of the best the Society has given. Gaul's sacred cantata "The Holy City" formed the principal piece in the programme, which was followed by Locke's incidental music to "Macbeth."

The third of the present series of Mr. Stockley's Orchestral Concerts was of special interest to local audiences. It served to introduce Mr. William Henley as a solo violinist at an important Concert on completion of his studies with Mr. August Wilhelmj, whose pupil he had been for some time past. Mr. Wilhelmj honoured Mr. Henley's début by his presence, and his visit was further utilised by asking him to conduct his own work, entitled "Ungarische Rhapsodie," a characteristic composition of pronounced national individuality, which was received with the greatest enthusiasm and was superbly rendered by the orchestra. Mr. Henley played two charming compositions by his master, "In memoriam" (in remembrance of Vieuxtemps) and a "Polonaise de Concert," both with orchestral accompaniments given under Mr. Stockley's beat. The purely orchestral pieces consisted of Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture, Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne," and Wagner's "Huldigungs" March. Mr. David Bispham was the only vocalist.

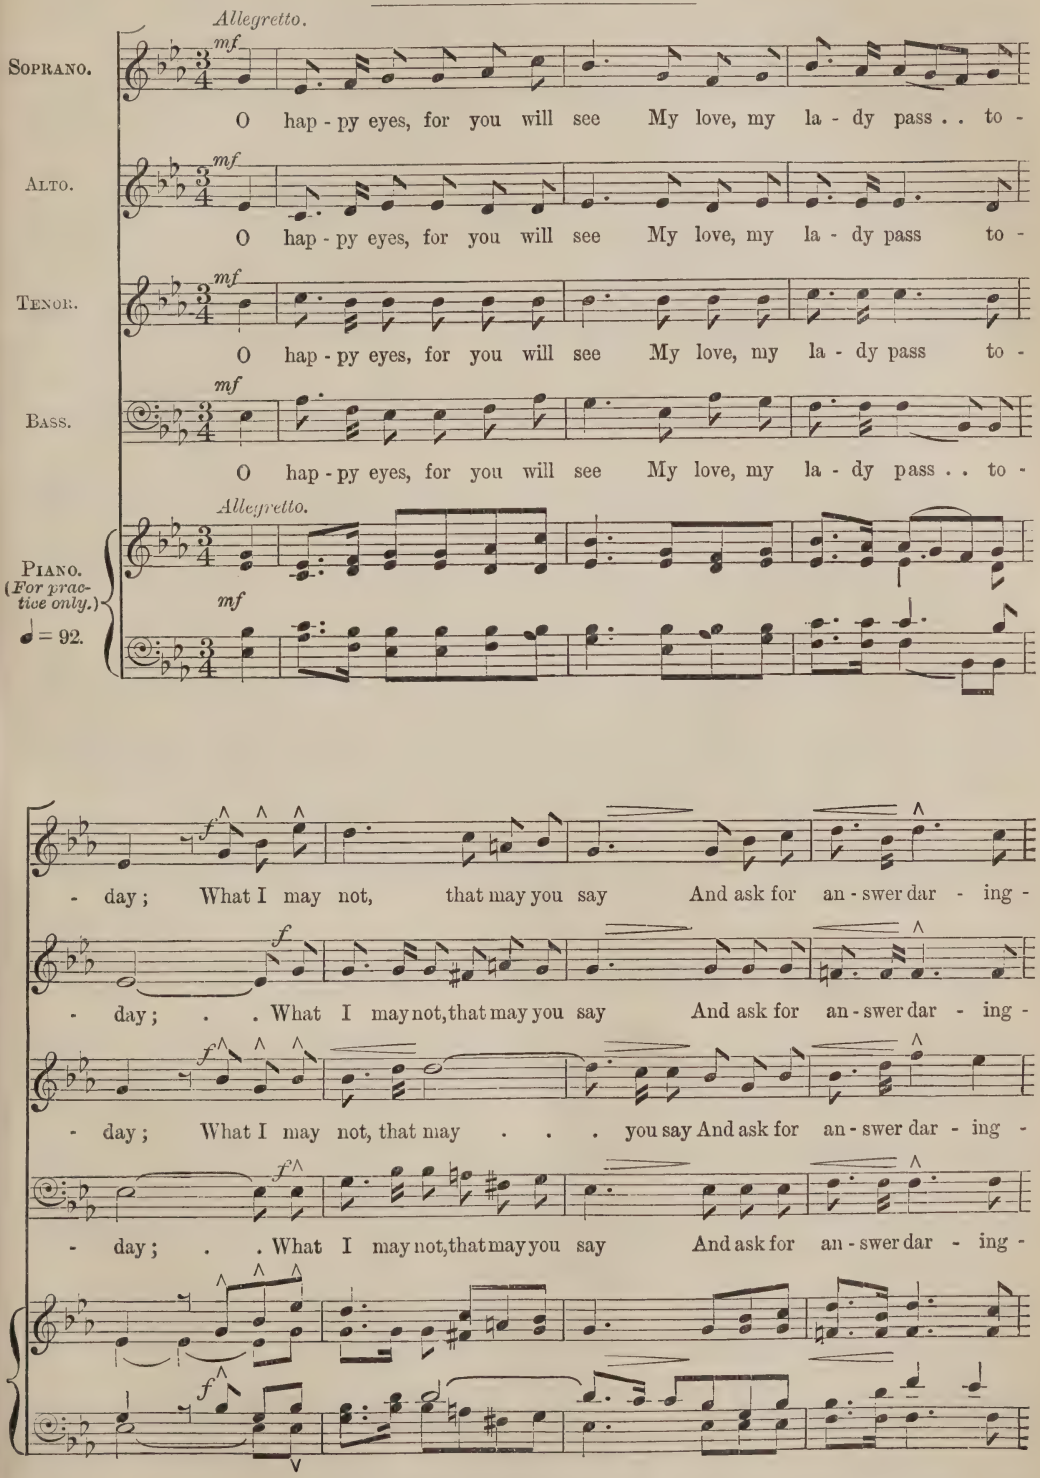
The Festival Choral Society gave a magnificent performance of Berlioz's "Faust," which attracted the largest audience of the season. Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap again showed himself a masterly conductor and an accomplished chorusmaster. Unstinted praise is due to the chorus for their admirable precision and their intelligent interpretation of the difficult choruses. A beautifully delicate pianissimo was attained by the choristers at the close of the scene "On the Banks of the Elbe." The solo parts were taken by Miss Evangeline Florence, Mr. Hedmondt, Mr. William Evans, and Mr. Watkin Mills with excellent results.

Mr. John Dunn appeared at Mr. Randell's annual Concert in the Town Hall, and met with an enthusiastic reception. His playing is certainly very fine.

The Birmingham Amateur Harmonic Association will give a performance of Schumann's "Manfred" music in April. Mr. Charles Fry has been specially engaged to recite selections from the play. It is long since this music has been given in complete form, and the performance will no doubt be of special interest.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)



In the long record of gratifying successes of which the Bristol Orpheus Glee Society are justly proud, no event, perhaps, in the city of its birth and nurture may hereafter be more marked than the annual Concert of 1896, when, on the 13th ult., a crowded assemblage gathered to hear the singers give voice to the pieces which constituted the programme prepared for the Queen and sung by the members of the Society at Windsor on December 3.

Such was the demand for tickets that all were disposed of two or three weeks before the date of the "ladies' night." Variety was secured in the arrangement of the compositions, as may be seen by those acquainted with them. The National Anthem stood at the head of the list, and it was followed by T. Cooke's spirited "Strike the Lyre," Sir Arthur Sullivan's soothing "The long day closes," Cooke's fine battle piece "Hohenlinden," a suave effusion, entitled "Peace," and a humorous trifle, "The Pedlar's Song," both by Mr. C. Lee Williams, Sir John Goss's broadly written "Ossian's Hymn to the Sun," Viotta's pathetic "The Dying Child," L. de Rille's military work, "The Retreat," and Cruickshank's melodious "Stars of the Summer Night." These pieces, all in the programme of the Royal Concert, made up the first part of the scheme on the 13th ult., the two extra ones—J. L. Hatton's "Absence" and W. Macfarren's "Highland War Song"—called for by her Majesty being placed with "As a garland" (Martin), "The Martyrs of the Arena" (L. de Rille), "Bold Turpin" (J. F. Bridge), "Evening" (Billeter), and "When evening casts" (Clowes Bayley) in the second part. Better singing by the Society has never been heard. The voices were perfectly balanced, the members were in remarkably good form, and so perfectly and artistically was everything done that scarcely a flaw could be detected throughout the whole performance. Mr. Riseley, who conducted with his customary inspiriting manner, used the bâton which the Queen gave him as a memento of the Society's visit to the Royal borough.

Exceptionally good representations of a couple of operas of Sullivan have been given by two different Associations. On the 6th ult. and two following days, the Bristol Amateur Operatic Society brought forward "The Mikado," in which the chief characters were taken by Miss Ethel Miller, Miss Marion Harris, Miss Nellie Brock, Mrs. Bruce Bedells; Messrs. Percy W. Rootham, H. Davies, J. Boddy, A. Young, and R. Culverwell. These ladies and gentlemen brought intelligence as well as a high degree of culture to bear in their acting and singing, and the members of the chorus also discharged their duties with commendable results. On the 14th, 15th, and 17th ult. the Clifton Amateur Operetta Society performed "The Pirates of Penzance" with a degree of excellence which in many respects would have done credit to a body of professionals. Mrs. L. M. Day, Mrs. A. Harvey, Mrs. G. Perrin, Miss K. Collins, Miss M. Hobbs, Dr. J. Swain, Dr. J. Dacre, Mr. A. S. Tratman, Mr. W. B. Cumberland, and Mr. J. M. Guttridge were entrusted with the leading characters, which they portrayed in a way that called forth warm approbation. The delightful choral portions of the work were sung with precision and effect, and the band, led by Mr. Theo. Carrington, did well. Mr. L. M. Day was a painstaking conductor.

When the March number of The Musical Times is in the hands of its readers, the question whether or not the Bristol Musical Festival of 1896 shall be held will probably be decided; but as the date of the meeting of the committee to settle the matter was the 3rd inst., the verdict will come too late to be inserted in the present issue. Much difficulty has been experienced in raising a guarantee fund of £4,000, owing, probably, to the reluctance of many people who have had to pay calls to continue their responsibility; but until the sum is assured the committee feel they can not go forward. If the guarantee is forthcoming active preparations will be made for the Triennial Meeting in October, with Mr. Riseley as conductor, and sanguine folk are firm in their belief that should it be held it will be an artistic success, and that the financial loss, if any, will be small.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On the 15th ult. the Rousbey Opera Company concluded an eight weeks' engagement at the Leinster Hall, during which the works presented included a new opera, "Mercedes," by Signor Pellegrini, based on Longfellow's "Spanish Student."

Very marked is the improvement in the standard of this now excellent company since the engagement of Mr. E. Goosens, jun., as conductor. Public appreciation of this fact was testified to by overflowing audiences crowding the house at every performance, and by the presentation of a handsome bâton to the conductor at the termination of the engagement.

The Chamber Music Recitals are continued on Monday afternoons at the Royal Dublin Society. On the 3rd ult. the programme comprised Schubert's String Quartet in D minor, Saint-Saëns's Sonata in C minor for violoncello and pianoforte, and Beethoven's Trio in D major (Op. 70, No. 1) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. The executants were Messrs. Papini, Darley, Grisard, and Bast, with Signor Esposito at the pianoforte.

The opening of the new organ at the Pro-Cathedral, Marlborough Street, was celebrated, on the 9th ult., by an evening performance of Haydn's "Imperial" Mass with orchestra, preceded and followed by a miscellaneous Concert of sacred music. The choir was assisted by the principals of Rousbey's Opera Company. The conductor was Mr. Percy Rogers and the organist Mr. Brendan Rogers, who concluded the performance with some of his own compositions.

Mrs. Scott-Ffennell's annual Concert took place at the Antient Concert Rooms, on January 24, and Madame Jeannie Rosse's Benefit Concert in the same locale on the 15th ult. At the latter, Miss Charlotte Russell, late of Mr. Hedmont's Opera Company, was heard with great acceptance; and a cantata, "The Ice Queen," was performed by Madame Rosse's pupils.

Three Pianoforte Recitals by Mr. de Greef took place at the Leinster Hall, under the direction of Mr. E. Liebmann, on the 18th, 20th, and 22nd ult. At the first Recital the programme included the "Moonlight" Sonata, some exquisitely delicate interpretations of Schumann and Chopin, and Brassin's transcription of Wagner's "Valkyrie's Ride."

MUSIC IN DUNDEE.

At the third Scottish Orchestral Concert, held on the 5th ult., the programme was almost entirely devoted to two novelties—viz., "The Death of Cuthullin," a dramatic cantata for soprano, tenor, and bass soli, chorus, and orchestra, by W. Augustus Barratt, and Sinding's Symphony in D minor. The former was conducted by Mr. Carl D. Hamilton, the soloists being Miss Jeanie Edmonds, Mr. Herbert Grover (whose artistic singing must be greatly praised), and Mr. T. H. Kennedy. The choral parts were very well sung by the Dundee Amateur Choral Union. Sinding's Symphony, an interesting and powerful work, was excellently played, under the direction of Mr. Kes. The only other piece in the programme was Liszt's Rhapsody (No. 4).

On January 29 the third Harrison-Simpson Concert was given with the following artists: Miss Evangeline Florence, Madame Alice Gomez, Mr. Andrew Black, Mdlle. Madeleine Ten Have, Miss Ethel Barns, The Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir, and Mr. Joseph Speaight.

The fifth meeting of the Dundee Society of Musicians, which took the form of a Pianoforte Recital by Miss Fanny Davies, was naturally one of unusual interest. Miss Davies was accorded a most enthusiastic reception and was elected a Hon. Member of the Society.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

The Norwich "Gate House" Choir has entered its twenty-fifth season, and on the 7th ult. gave its forty-ninth Concert to an audience which completely filled Noverre's Room. Having been present at forty-eight of the Concerts given by this Society, I venture to affirm that Mr. Kingston Rudd, its painstaking conductor, has never had a finer lot of voices under his control than now respond to his beat. The parts are evenly balanced, the words are clearly enunciated, and light and shade are properly noticed. The Choir was heard in Benedict's "Home," Schubert's "To Sylvia," arranged for four voices by John E. West, and in two scenes from Purcell's "King Arthur." Solos were also sung in good style by members of the choir. The committee usually engage some noted instrumentalist to vary the programmes, and on this occasion the choice happily fell on Mr. Leonard Borwick, who made his first appearance in Norwich. His programme, which took the form of a Recital, embraced compositions from the following masters: Bach, Scarlatti, Beethoven, Schumann, Rachmaninoff, and Liszt.

The common course of nature appears to be reversed in the case of the Norwich Philharmonic Society, for instead of age bringing decrepitude and weakness, it increases its vigour. The band grows larger and certainly more efficient, and its ninetieth Concert, on the 10th ult., compared very favourably with any preceding one. The long service of Dr. Horace Hill, as conductor, and Mr. F. W. B. Noverre, as leader, has no doubt something to do with the steady improvement shown by the members. The principal instrumental pieces were Haydn's Symphony in E flat (Salomon, No. 10), Schubert's "Unfinished" in B minor, Overture to "Anacreon," and the Coronation March from "Le Prophète." Songs were contributed by Mrs. Robin Gray and the Rev. A. E. Black.

The Diss Choral Society was sufficiently ambitious to give a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," in the Corn Hall, on the evening of January 28, with a result which fully justified the step. The local band and chorus were strengthened by amateur help from London and Norwich, so that the choruses and accompaniments fared better than could be reasonably expected. The quartet of principals comprised Miss A. Muller, Miss H. Saunders, Mr. Harry Stubbs, and Mr. George Stubbs; while the minor parts in the double quartet were filled by members of the Society. The solos were rendered with commendable care and finish, but the most enjoyable features were the concerted numbers, which were sung with great taste. Mr. T. M. Pullen conducted, and great credit is due to him for the way in which he has trained the material at his command; Mr. T. E. Gatehouse led the band, and Mr. Hemstock did useful service at the organ.

A highly creditable performance of Haydn's "Creation" took place in the Public Hall, Ipswich, on the 18th ult., conducted by Mr. E. Minshall. The principal vocalists were Miss Emily Davies, Mr. Allen C. Orriss (a local tenor) and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail, who did full justice to their share of the work. The chorus consisted of the Nonconformist Choirs of the town, and the members gave a spirited rendering of the fine choruses which stud the "Creation." The band, led by Mr. Luther Hooper, proved of better quality than is usually heard in Ipswich, arising from the fact that military bandsmen formed the wind contingent.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

One of the most important events in our musical season was the first visit to Edinburgh of Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch and his party with their ancient instruments. Their first appearance was at the fourth of Professor Niecks's interesting series of University Concerts (January 29). The programme, which was drawn from works of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, was comprehensive, varied, and thoroughly representative. The important part played by England before the eighteenth century was agreeably shown by the number and the beauty of the pieces by English composers. Henry Purcell was represented by a Toccata and a "Ground" for the harpsichord, and by a song from "The Indian Queen"; Thomas Morley, by "Fantazies for two viols"; Christopher Simpson, by "Divisions on a Ground" for the viol da gamba with harpsichord accompaniment; and three particularly charming pieces for two viols and harpsichord, by an anonymous English composer, were striking proofs of the careless exuberance of England's Golden Age.

The other numbers were mostly by Italian composers—Caroso's "Il Ballerino" for the viol and lute; a "Follia" for the violin, gamba, and harpsichord, by Corelli; and Sonatas for the harpsichord, by D. Scarlatti, in many ways the most important works on the programme, as they were of course the most advanced in form. French composers were represented by a very elaborate Suite for gamba and harpsichord, by Marais; three charming pieces for harpsichord, by Couperin; and Rameau's "Deuxième Concert" for the harpsichord, viol d'amore, and viol da gamba. Germany was represented only by Handel (a gamba and harpsichord Sonata). Songs by Purcell, Caccini, Legrenzi, and Lotti were well sung by Miss May Gibb.

The Edinburgh Bach Society took advantage of the opportunity to arrange a Concert where the public might hear some of the master's compositions on the instruments for which they were originally written. A well-chosen programme was rewarded, on January 30, by an audience which filled the Freemasons' Hall in every part, very few seats being unoccupied. The programme included a Sonata for gamba and harpsichord, which was received with great favour; the important D minor Concerto (particularly well played by Madame Dolmetsch), and a Sonata for viol d'amore, flute, and harpsichord. The songs included "Patron, das macht der Wind," with its peculiarly effective obbligati, and "Komm, süsses Kreuz," with the lovely gamba obbligato, most artistically played by Miss Dolmetsch. At both of these Concerts the interest of the conditions was heightened and the beauties of the compositions well brought out by the thorough sympathy of the artists with their work and the complete command they showed over their quaint and beautiful instruments. Mr. Dolmetsch himself played the violin, viol d'amore, and lute, as well as the harpsichord (accompaniments); Madame Dolmetsch the harpsichord; Miss Hélène Dolmetsch the viol da gamba; Mr. Mathison, second violin; Mr. Frank Laubach, viola; and Signor Barretta, flute. Miss May Gibb and Mr. T. H. Kennedy were equally successful in the vocal numbers.

The ninth and tenth of Messrs. Paterson's Orchestral Concerts were given on the 3rd and 17th ult. On the 3rd, Herr Burmester made his first appearance in Edinburgh, and roused enormous enthusiasm by his phenomenal playing. The Symphony was an interesting composition by Sinding. The programme also included the Introduction to the third Act of "Lohengrin" (well played and loudly encored) and the Rákoczy March. At the last Concert Mrs. Katharine Fisk was the vocalist.

Messrs. Paterson have reason to congratulate themselves on the enthusiastic support they have been able to command throughout their nine seasons of Orchestral Concerts; and the last three winters have abundantly shown that a larger hall would greatly increase the audiences and consequently the staying power of the Edinburgh part of the scheme.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A model programme was submitted at the eleventh Classical Concert of the Choral and Orchestral Union, and, pleasing to relate, the audience was one of the largest of the season. Singular enthusiasm prevailed, moreover, throughout the evening, and more particularly at the close of the performance of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. It is safe to say that under Mr. Kes's bâton the work has never been heard to finer advantage on the banks of the Clyde. Then Mr. Leonard Borwick once more showed his claims to first rank as a pianist, fairly revelling in the intricacies of Saint-Saëns's Concerto (No. 2) in G minor. Miss Ada Crossley again found high favour as a rising contralto, and her career will, doubtless, be watched with much interest by the numerous friends she has made this season in Glasgow.

On the 1st ult. the Scottish Orchestra renewed acquaintance with a City Hall audience, thanks to the enterprise of Mr. James Airlie, and on the 4th ult. Mr. Willy Burmester made his first appearance in Glasgow. His greeting was cordial in the extreme, the new-comer securing an easy series of triumphs, alike as regards his brilliant technique in the Paganini variations, and, in what is to more purpose, his artistic reading of the beautiful slow movement in Spohr's Violin Concerto (No. 7), as also the Bach air. Sinding's Symphony in D minor did not create much interest, and it may be doubted if further hearings would show that the work is even worthy of the young Scandinavian school. Miss Lydia Leburn, another new-comer, sang one or two songs with pleasing effect. At the Popular Orchestral Concert, on the 8th ult., Madame Clara Samuell achieved, as she always does, an artistic success. Again Saint-Saëns was drawn upon, and if during the season we have had just more than enough of the clever Frenchman's compositions, it would be wrong to quarrel with many excellent bits of workmanship in his "Suite Algerienne." A "Handel Concert" formed the programme on the 11th ult., lengthy enough in all conscience, but embodying many examples of the composer of "The Messiah" at his best. The various choral numbers were exceptionally well rendered—in several instances the Choral Union sang, indeed, with ample vocal power, showing also the skilful training of Mr. Joseph Bradley, a conductor of musicianlike attainments. The soloists were Madame Samuell, Miss Clara Butt—whose remarkable voice created a great impression—Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Douglas Powell; while Mr. Berry did admirable work at the organ. The annual Festival of the Choral Union took place after the Concert, when Sir Donald Matheson, an old and highly esteemed friend of the Union, presided over a large gathering.

Considerable interest centred in the programme drawn up for the last Classical Concert of the series, on the 18th ult. Mr. Mark Hambourg essayed Schumann's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra with a fair amount of success. He has yet a good deal to learn, but nature has apparently endowed him with the "spark." The orchestral pieces in the programme included fine performances of Brahms's Symphony in D (No. 2), the Prelude to "Lohengrin," and Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture (No. 3). At the close of the last-named work Mr. Kes had a cordial recall on his last appearance at a Classical Concert. The vocalist was Mrs. Katharine Fisk.

The plebiscite Concert was announced to take place on Saturday evening, the 22nd ult., when the following, amongst other pieces, showed the results of the voting: Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, "Tannhäuser" Overture, Delibes's "Sylvia," and "Introduction to the Third Act of Lohengrin." But the whole selections show, indeed, the "people's will" on perfectly familiar lines, and one may well ask is it worth renewing an oft-told experience? On this occasion the orchestra made its last appearance for the season.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The appointment of Mr. F. H. Cowen to the conductorship of the Philharmonic Society has been received in all quarters with unalloyed satisfaction. The extreme probability of his accession to the post was foreshadowed in our Liverpool letter a couple of months ago as the result of that "wish" which was "father to the thought" in the minds alike of the band, chorus, and auditors who regularly attend these Concerts. As has been stated in the daily papers, Mr. Cowen also succeeds to the conductorship of the Hallé Concerts in Manchester, and thus the one orchestra which has for so many years past done duty in the two great Lancashire cities will be kept together, to the great advantage of both. Outside the special circle affected by the Concerts which he will be called upon to conduct, the advent of Mr. Cowen to these parts will be greeted with the heartiest welcome. As President of the Liverpool Musical Club during the period of its greatest vitality and before it became practically absorbed in the Incorporated Society of Musicians, the new-comer had been the friend of all the local professional men of his own calling. His repeated presence, and the production of his operas at the Court Theatre by the Royal Carl Rosa Company, had brought him into the happiest touch with another large section of the public, and his expected partial residence in this district will be as essentially good for the cause of art as it will be popular with all classes of musical people.

The two Concerts given by the Philharmonic Society during the past month included in their respective programmes the "Choral" Symphony of Beethoven and that by Tschaïkowsky in E minor (No. 5). The performance of the first-named work, though it revealed the weak spots in the chorus, and notably among the sopranos thereof, proved in all other respects a triumph for all concerned; and that of the modern composer was, because of its purely self-contained orchestral character, even better. The appearance of Mr. Cowen for the first time as permanent conductor took place on the 18th ult., and was marked by an ovation. The whole of the chorus and the occupants of the galleries, together with the greater part of the usually undemonstrative holders of private boxes and stalls, rose and applauded the new-comer in the heartiest manner, and again was enthusiasm manifested at the close of the Symphony and an excerpt from the familiar "Language of Flowers." Two more Concerts remain of the present season, one at least of which the late Sir Joseph Barnby had been engaged to direct while the appointment of conductor was still only placed in commission.

Much comment and not a little regret has attended the recent disposal of the Royal Court Theatre to other management. For many years past the building has been regarded not only as the most valuable asset, but as the home and headquarters of the Carl Rosa Company, and its ultimate destination is not unnaturally regarded with extreme interest and at least an equal amount of anxiety. It is stated, however, that the theatre will be conducted in future on similar lines to those hitherto followed, and that the public may rely upon being treated to the best of everything. It is to be hoped that all these promises will be carried out, and with the high-class management now promised, such is pretty sure to be the case; but it is regarded as an ominous sign that pantomime is again to take the place of grand opera next Christmas. In the meantime the regular Carl Rosa season, postponed from its customary place at the end of December, is now running its course—though the latter is limited to only about half its previous length—and an assurance is given that in future, as in the past, opera will form an important part of every year's engagements.

The Orchestral Society under Mr. A. E. Rodewald gave at its third regular Concert of the season Beethoven's Symphony (No. 8) in F, with very excellent effect, and the same fine body of performers is announced for other Concerts at the Philharmonic Hall later on. One of these is in connection with the winter evenings entertainments and the other for a charitable object. The Società Armonica, with Mr. W. C. Cafferata again in the conductor's seat, on the 11th ult. essayed Schubert's Symphony in C major. At the Sunday Concerts the orchestra, augmented for both occasions to the number of ninety, gave, on the 2nd and 9th ult., under Mr. W. I. Argent, Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony and a good selection from the works of Wagner.

The members of the Schiever Quartet have been more than usually successful this season, and their most recent appearance, on the 15th ult., placed once more in evidence the high condition of excellence reached by them and which, indeed, reminds the older race of Concert-goers of that wonderful organisation, consisting of Joachim, Vieuxtemps, Webb, Ries, Paque, Piatti, and others, from whom were recruited the Quartets of the Monday "Pops." at St. James's Hall nearly half-a-century ago. Mr. Theodore Lawson gave an excellent Chamber Concert on the 24th ult., the Quartet engaged being equal to all requirements. At Dreapers' Rooms the customary Matinées have been in progress, under the direction of Mr. S. Vickers, who is now the manager in residence. Recitals have been given during the past month by Messrs. de Greef, Stavenhagen, and Saunders.

Messrs. Harrison have given another of their Concerts, with quite a host of vocal and instrumental notabilities, whose individual performances, as usual, formed the chief attraction; and on similar lines the Saturday evenings of Mr. T. Shaw have been running their course.

The Music School, which for four years had pursued its work under disastrous conditions, owing to its outgrowing the building in which it was first established, has entered upon a new lease of life at the premises of the late Art Club, which time-honoured Institution last year unfortunately had to be wound up. The building in question is one of the best of its kind for the purposes to which it is now put that could be found in the kingdom. It possesses a very fine concert-room as well as every other accommodation, and is in the most important residential part of the city.

During the past month Organ Recitals at St. George's Hall have been given by Mr. Claude Ridley and Mr. E. T. Driffield, of Liverpool; Mr. H. W. Watson, of the Crystal Palace; Mr. J. H. England, of Leeds; and Mr. A. D. Currie, of Stirling. It is to be regretted that Mr. W. T. Best is lying most dangerously ill at his residence at Broad Green, near Liverpool.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The appointment of Mr. F. H. Cowen to succeed Sir Charles Hallé as director of the orchestra which has played so large a part in the remarkable development of a taste for high-class instrumental music in this part of the country, has given the greatest satisfaction to all those who were beginning to realise the necessity to re-establish that uniformity of control which, during nearly forty years under one conductor, had brought the corps into such a high state of efficiency. Our new chief has already shown that there is no danger of his allowing any carelessness among his forces, or of suffering us to yearn for that blending of effects and balance of tone to which we have been accustomed. The last Concert in January was remarkable not only for an absolutely perfect rendering of the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" (which, strangely, had been kept out of hearing for some seventeen years) and of the "Egmont" and "Tannhäuser" Overtures, but through the introduction of the "Welsh" Symphony of the conductor, which, having been written in 1884, was very curiously charged by a confused local critic as being "reminiscent of some of Dvorák's devices," as well as being "based upon national melodies." If the lovely second subject in the opening Allegro is a national tune, the principality is even richer in the possession of musical gems than most people imagine it to be.

The performance of the "Francis" of Edgar Tinel, at the fifteenth Concert, was eagerly looked forward to as the one important choral novelty; and it is a pity that the performance suffered so greatly from many unforeseen circumstances as to cause a wonder how at any one of our provincial festivals four or five works could be undertaken in one week. The outline and scope of "Francis" were fairly discussed in The Musical Times of last October, so that it is unnecessary to enter into any detailed description of the plot. That M. Tinel has talent, industry, and ambition is evident; and he succeeds in impressing us with such an admiration for his earnestness and zeal as to kindle a hope that the time may come when, with far more moderate labour, he may be able to produce immensely higher results.

The sixteenth Concert of the series was rendered specially attractive by the re-appearance of Mr. Willy Hess, who played, in masterly fashion, Spohr's D minor Concerto and other pieces; and by the pianoforte performance of Madame Frickenhaus. Fortunately, Madame Alice Lamb was at hand ready to fill the gap caused by the indisposition of the expected vocalist, and to display a voice of somewhat limited compass, but of excellent quality, and such refinement of taste as led her to select Cowen's little gem, "Snowflakes," and Lassen's equally charming "All Soul's Day," and to interpret both with the requisite simplicity and delicacy. Mr. Brodsky conducted with energy and watchfulness, securing for Tschaïkowsky's Fantasie-Overture "Romeo et Juliette" quite as good a presentation as it deserved.

It certainly was disappointing that M. Tafanel was unable to come over from Paris to conduct the Concert on the 20th ult., but with M. Brodsky at hand no difficulty could possibly be felt; and the "Jupiter" Symphony, with Weber's Overture, "Der Freischütz," were very happily rendered; while the re-appearance of Dr. Joachim was sufficient to crown the evening with glory. In no work is the veteran violinist heard to greater advantage than in the Concerto of Beethoven, for the greater portion of which his massive breadth of style eminently fits him. Miss Sarah Berry is rapidly advancing in the public estimation; but she still has a passive style of singing which might, with gain, be occasionally shaken off.

For their third Subscription Concert, Messrs. Harrison, in conjunction with Messrs. Hime and Addison of this city, depended mainly upon the attractiveness of Mr. Ben Davies and Mr. Andrew Black, although other soloists and the Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir assisted. The third programme of Dr. Watson's choir was rich in that class of concerted music in which the "Vocal Society" delights; and a pleasant tribute was paid to Dr. Hiles by the excellent singing of his prize glee, "Hushed in Death."

In spite of the rivalry of the many pianists of unquestionable ability now competing for public favour, Mr. de Greef is establishing himself in the esteem of those able to appreciate the versatility of talent which he displays, combined with adequate executive dexterity and with considerable depth and fervour of expression. We are also grateful to him for avoiding many pieces which have of late appeared in almost every programme with tiresome persistence. He has not played here the "Carnival" or the "Papillons" of Schumann, and he has touched the rhapsodical effusions of Liszt as lightly as is possible in these days.

Of Chamber Concerts we have had two peculiarly interesting—that of Dr. Carl Fuchs at the Schiller Anstalt, with an admirable quartet party, giving the C sharp Minor (Op. 131) of Beethoven, and with Mr. Bispham as vocalist; and that of Mr. Edward Sachs, at the Concert Hall. The Manchester Philharmonic Society, of which Mr. G. W. Lane is conductor, announces that at its annual fête, July 4, held, as usual, in the Botanical Gardens, Dr. Hiles will have to adjudicate at a contest of male-voice as well as of mixed-voice choirs.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

So successful was the performance of "Israel in Egypt" given by the Gateshead Choral Society in December that the committee resolved to give the work a second performance, of a popular character, and this took place in the Town Hall, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the 5th ult. A uniform price of one shilling was charged for admission, with the result that the large hall was crowded in every part and many people were unable to obtain admission.

The great success of this Concert suggests that there is a good opening for popular performances of standard choral works in large provincial towns. In Newcastle-on-Tyne there have been comparatively few opportunities in recent years of hearing important works for voices and orchestra, and it has been generally thought that the taste for such works has been gradually declining. It would appear, however, that the masses are ready and eager to show their appreciation for such works if they can be brought within their reach pecuniarily.

A Popular Concert was given in the Town Hall, Newcastle, on the 8th ult. The artists were Madame Goddard, Madame Burelli, and the Westminster Singers: Messrs. Walter Coward, Charles Ackerman, Harper Kearton, and W. H. Brereton. Miss Kate Liddle presided at the pianoforte.

At the Harrison Concert in Sunderland, on the 3rd ult., the Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir, under Madame Clara Novello Davies, created much enthusiasm. The other artists were Madame Gomez, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Andrew Black, Miss Ethel Barns (violin), Miss Ten Have (pianoforte), and Mr. Speaight (accompanist), all of whom were eminently successful in their efforts.

A performance of Haydn's "Creation" was given in Tower Hill Church, Wooler, on the 21st ult., by the newly-formed Wooler Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. C. Stanley Wise. The principals were Madame Strathearn, Mr. E. Kemp, and Mr. D. Harrison. The assistance of the Alnwick Orchestral Society was secured for the occasion, and the performance passed off very successfully.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Burslem—the mother town of the Potteries—(thanks to Messrs. Basil Stuart and M. Hall) now possesses a theatre, and on January 27 the Mayor and Corporation attended the opening performances by the Neilson Opera Company. The crowded audiences heard some excellent singing by principals and chorus. The venture has been a financial success.

Mr. D'Oyly Carte's Company occupied Hanley Theatre Royal for fourteen nights last month, and the "Vicar of Bray" was performed for the first time in this district.

On the 6th ult. "Judas Maccabæus" was performed, by orchestra and chorus of 150 performers, at Tunstall Jubilee Chapel. Mr. R. A. Binnall conducted, and the principals were Madame Conway, Miss Eardley, Mr. Hamlyn Crimp, and Mr. C. Meir. The chapel was crowded on the occasion.

A new choral organisation—the Wolstanton Choral Society—made its public appearance on the 13th ult., selecting Macfarren's "May Day." Although numerically small, evidence of sound and skilful training was given, and Mr. Blaikie (conductor) is to be complimented upon the success.

The Meakin Concert authorities engaged the Royal Artillery Band for their fifth Concert, on the 10th ult., at the Victoria Hall. The performance of this famous band (under Cavalier L. Zavertal) was an "object lesson" to the numerous bands of this district. Miss Hannah Jones and Master Ford rendered the vocal pieces of the programme. Mr. Sherratt accompanied.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTHERN COUNTIES.

Mr. E. H. Moberly is a tower of strength to the cause of high-class music in Wilts and Hants, and the Concerts of the Test Valley Musical Society, under his conductorship, are always amongst the most important events of the season. The Concerts given on the 10th and 11th ult., at Salisbury and Winchester, were not less interesting in their way than any which had preceded them. No great choral work had been selected for performance, but the fine choir of the Society had ample opportunities for the display of its powers in the opening chorus of Brahms's Requiem, and in the Hymn of the Spirits of Arimanes, from Schumann's "Manfred." Part-songs by Leslie, Stanford, and others were also rendered to perfection. The string orchestra, a special feature of these Concerts, was heard to great advantage in Handel's Concerto Grosso (No. 7), an Elegie by Tschaïkowsky, and Grimm's Suite in canon form (Op. 10). The tone of the strings was admirable, and the attention to light and shade quite remarkable. Miss Montagu was the solo vocalist at each Concert, and Mr. Moberly conducted with his usual ability and judgment.

The Sarum Choral Society's Concert, on January 28—too late for detailed notice last month—was successful enough to justify reference to it now. A well-chosen selection of Handel's choruses, chiefly from "The Messiah," interspersed with vocal solos from the same master's oratorios, made up an interesting programme. The choral singing was very good throughout, and the solo vocalists, Miss Kate Cherry and Mr. Walter Foreman, acquitted themselves in a thoroughly satisfactory manner. A capable orchestra was led by Mr. F. L. Bartlett, Miss Aylward presiding at the pianoforte and Mr. E. W. Naylor doing good service at the organ. Pianoforte solos by Purcell and Scarlatti were also played by Mr. Naylor. Mr. W. T. Bowey conducted.

Cowen's cantata "St. John's Eve" and Van Bree's "St. Cecilia's Day" were performed by the Marlborough Choral Society, on the 17th ult., in the Town Hall. The chorus, consisting of about fifty voices, did full justice to its share of each work, and the solos were well sung by Miss Katie Thomas, Miss Beatrice Chambers, Mr. Ralph Peyton, and Mr. Arthur Shillito. Miss Greenland officiated as accompanist, and Mr. W. S. Bambridge was the conductor. Handel's "Samson" has been chosen as the next work to be put into rehearsal by the Society.

At Swindon the Harmonic Society, under the conductorship of Mr. George Whitehead, gave an excellent performance of Cowen's "Rose Maiden," on the 12th ult., in the Corn Exchange.

The appearance of the Hungerford Choral Society on the 5th ult. was a very satisfactory one, upon which the conductor, Mr. T. Webb, is to be complimented. Macfarren's cantata "May Day" and Jensen's "Feast of Adonis" formed the chief features of the programme, and the manner of their performance reflected great credit on all concerned, Miss Wells and Miss Dolton undertook the solos, the part-song in "May Day" being sung by Miss Wells, Mrs. Stuart Higgs, Mr. Hawkens, and Mr. Camp. Mr. J. S. Liddle played a violin solo, and a small but capable orchestra added considerably to the success of the Concert.

The Calne Musical Society gave a Concert in the Town Hall, on the 18th ult., when Gaul's "Holy City" and Cowen's "Rose Maiden" constituted the programme. The principal vocalists were Miss Monk, Miss Holbrook, Mr. A. Castings, and Mr. Jackson, and Mr. W. R. Pullein conducted.

The Westbury Philharmonic Society gave a miscellaneous Concert on the 4th ult., at the Laverton Institute. Gounod's "By Babylon's Wave," in the first part, and Dr. C. H. Lloyd's choral ballad, "Allan-a-dale," and Eaton Faning's "Song of the Vikings" in the second part, were admirably sung; and the orchestral numbers, including the Andante from Haydn's Symphony in D, were not less satisfactorily given. Miss Ada Potter and Mr. Alfred Wetten were the solo vocalists, and Miss Roe presided at the pianoforte. Mr. Alfred Foley conducted.

Romberg's "Lay of the Bell" was selected by the Melksham Choral Society for performance at the Concert which took place on January 30, under the conductorship of Mr. E. Nunn. The principals were Miss Eva Stratton, Mr. A. Marston, and Mr. Fritz Marston, and the band and chorus numbered about seventy performers. The Society has already set to work upon "The Revenge," which is to be performed at the next Concert.

The final arrangements for the Bournemouth Musical Festival, which is to take place this month, have been made, and the following vocalists have been engaged: Miss Gertrude Izard, Miss Greta Williams, Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. Henry Bailey. Mr. Charles Fletcher will lead the orchestra, and Mr. Cowen and Dr. Bridge will conduct their own works. The members of St. John's Choral Society gave a performance of Gaul's cantata "Israel in the Wilderness," in St. John's Church, Bournemouth, on the 4th ult. The solos were taken by Mrs. Robbins, Mr. Williams, and Mr. Robbins; the accompaniments were played on the organ by Mr. H. Holloway, and Mr. W. Lee conducted. The Boscombe Philharmonic Society, which has for its conductor Dr. W. E. Thomas, is in a flourishing condition, and the Concert, which took place on January 29, furnished unmistakable evidence of the fact. The programme was made up of selections from "The Messiah," twenty-five of the best-known numbers of the oratorio being given. On the part of the chorus, which numbered about eighty, there was a precision of attack and a confidence which told plainly of much conscientious study and careful rehearsal. The orchestra was a strong and efficient one, and did full justice to the Overture and Pastoral Symphony, as well as to the accompaniments. Miss Buckley, Miss Annie Wilson, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Tufnail were the principal vocalists.

The Southbourne Musical Society, of which Mr. Macklin is conductor, made its appearance on the 10th ult., with a miscellaneous programme, including Dr. Vincent's vocal fantasia on National Airs, and part-songs by Mendelssohn, Macirone, and Barnby. A small orchestra was led by Mr. Payn, and some excellent songs and violin solos were given by ladies and gentlemen of the locality. The Concert given by the Poole Musical Association, under the conductorship of Mr. Gerald Lee, on the 14th ult., was of a miscellaneous character, a prominent feature being Hamish MacCunn's choral ballad "Lord Ullin's Daughter," and a selection of part-songs and madrigals. Mrs. Gerald Lee, Miss Charlotte Dickens, Mr. Herbert Sims Reeves and Mr. Arthur Thorne also contributed to the programme.

A Concert was given in the Abbey Hall, Romsey, on the 11th ult., by the members of the Abbey Congregational Choir, augmented for the occasion. Sir Joseph Barnby's cantata "Rebekah" formed the first part of the programme, the solos being taken by Miss Jessie Scullard, Mr. S. M. Boyle, and Mr. James Read. The work was well rendered and highly appreciated. The accompaniments were played by Mrs. G. C. Ely and Miss Maynard. Mr. W. Summers conducted.

The Lymington Choral Society gave a good performance of T. Mee Pattison's cantata "The Ancient Mariner," on the 11th ult., to a large audience. The solo vocalists were Madame Newling, Miss Edith Bower, Mr. F. H. Noyes, and Mr. W. G. Snook; and the accompaniments were played by Miss Edith Elliott and Mr. C. A. Frecknall. The conductor, Mr. H. G. Frecknall, is to be congratulated upon the complete success of the Concert.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

So far as quantity goes, Leeds has not been badly supplied with music during the past month. Of some nine or ten Concerts that have to be chronicled, however, more than half the number were no more than popular musical entertainments, of but little artistic importance. One of the most interesting events has been the twenty-fifth anniversary Concert of the Leeds Philharmonic Society, an institution which has done much for choral music in the town, producing many important works, in addition to the stock pieces that are necessary to the existence of such a society. Unfortunately, however, it has fallen upon evil days, entering upon the present season under a load of debt, and with the disadvantage of beginning work under a new conductor, whose appointment has been the subject of much adverse comment on the part of resident native musicians. Their patriotic instincts revolted at the introduction of a foreigner into the town. And now a rival Society, under the conductorship of a local musician, the organist of the Parish Church, has been formed, and is about to begin operations. Though any spirit of opposition is earnestly disclaimed by its promoters, it remains to be seen whether a town that has barely maintained one society will be able to support two. A programme, interesting to both the general public and the musician, attracted a large audience to the Concert on January 22. In Sullivan's "Golden Legend" Miss Emily Davies, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Watkin Mills were the soloists, and a work so familiar to all concerned in its performance went with the zest and spirit that might be expected. The first half of the programme was given up to a Purcell celebration—rather tardy, but not the less welcome. A much abbreviated version of his "St. Cecilia" Ode of 1692, in which the contralto solo, "The Fife," was taken by a member of the chorus, Miss H. M. Atkinson, was followed by some really interesting solos. Mr. Watkin Mills gave the fine air "Arise, ye subterranean winds," which he sang most forcibly; Miss Emily Davies chose a wonderfully expressive soprano air from "Dido and Æneas," and Mr. Chandos the popular "Come, if you dare." Mr. Beyschlag conducted with much ability, entering into the spirit of the music more thoroughly than on the other two occasions since his appointment. Within a fortnight during the past month two of the Subscription Concerts have fallen. On January 29 the string quartet of which Mr. Gompertz is leader showed the perfection of their ensemble in a Quartet by Smetana ("Aus meinem Leben," in E minor), and, together with Mr. Borwick, in Schumann's popular Pianoforte Quintet. Mr. Borwick's playing of solos by Chopin, Rachmaninoff, and Liszt was very fine, and marked by a warmth of expression not always noticeable in his performances. Mr. Bispham was, as vocalist, emphatically the right man in the right place. On the 12th ult. the brilliant virtuosity of Mr. Burmester and Mr. Frederick Dawson, tempered by the reticent singing of Miss Sarah Berry, were the leading characteristics of the Concert. Mr. Burmester gave a fine reading of the Seventh Concerto of Spohr, playing the slow movement with remarkable warmth of expression. An enterprise of importance to Leeds was begun on the 8th ult., when the Leeds Permanent Orchestra gave its first Concert. An institution more valuable to the town can hardly be imagined than a body of permanent professional musicians, who, constantly playing together, should soon be able to surpass the best manned "scratch" bands. Under Mr. Benton's conductorship a programme of fairly familiar music, of which the "Tannhäuser" Overture was perhaps the most exacting piece, was very satisfactorily performed. Mr. G. W. Buckley played two movements of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and Miss Edna Thornton and Mr. William Thornton were the vocalists. On the 10th ult. Mr. Gordon Heller, a local teacher of singing, gave a Concert, at which the excellence of his teaching was demonstrated by the efforts of seventeen pupils, whilst the severity of his taste was shown in the high character of their songs. Miss K. Brigstocke was the pianist, and played pieces by Schumann and Chopin with good taste. On the 14th ult. Miss Cover gave an interesting Concert in aid of charity. A choir, got together for the occasion, took part in Mendelssohn's "Lorelei" and Gade's "Spring Message"; Miss Emily Shinner was the solo violinist and Miss Cover the solo pianist. At Mr. Whitelock's Subscription Concert, on the 17th ult., Madame Fanny Moody, Mr. Charles Manners, and Mr. Wills Page were the vocalists, and Mr. Christensen was the pianist, in a programme that calls for no criticism. Nor could the "Musical Evening" of the Messrs. Haddock, on the following day, be regarded as of any special moment, save that it introduced in Mr. Calamani an accomplished young violinist new to Leeds. The vocalists were Miss Rosa Travis, Miss Alice McFarlane, Messrs. John Child and Stanley Cook; and Mr. Arthur Ayres played pianoforte solos by Chopin and Liszt in artistic style.

At Bradford the Permanent Orchestra has given two more Concerts. On January 25 Mr. Dunn's masterly playing of the Beethoven Violin Concerto was the chief feature of the programme, which also included the "Tannhäuser" Overture, now in danger of becoming hackneyed, and Mr. Hamish MacCunn's graceful Overture "Land of the Mountain and the Flood." Miss Maggie Purvis was the vocalist. On the 7th ult. Mr. Burmester appeared at the fifth Subscription Concert. Not even his phenomenal playing could make Paganini's First Concerto other than tedious, and the best thing in the programme was Tschaïkowsky's F minor Symphony, a fine performance of which was given by the Hallé band, under Dr. Stanford's able conductorship. Wagner's "Faust" Overture, too, came by way of a novelty, and was, therefore, the more welcome. Miss Janson was the vocalist. The Bradford Harmony Society, whose business is the cultivation of chamber music, gave a Concert on the 3rd ult. Smetana's Pianoforte Trio (Op. 15) and Brahms's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in G (Op. 78) were the principal things in the programme, the players being Messrs. Müller (violin), Giessing (violoncello), and Oppenheim (pianoforte).

Of two Subscription Concerts at Huddersfield, one might be more appropriately styled an entertainment, the entertainer being Mr. George Grossmith. On the 11th ult., however, an Orchestral Concert was given by the Hallé band, under Dr. J. C. Bridge's conductorship. Dr. Bridge's "Chester" Symphony, written for the Chester Festival of 1894, was capitally played, and Mr. Brodsky gave an exceptionally fine reading of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto. The rest of the programme does not call for detailed notice, but mention must be made of the able singing of Mr. John Browning. Lady Hallé and Mr. Leonard Borwick's admirable playing was the feature of the third of the Halifax Subscription Concerts, on the 5th ult.; Max Bruch's beautiful G minor Concerto was superbly played by Lady Hallé, and Mr. Borwick gave a most sympathetic reading of the Etudes Symphoniques of Schumann. On January 28 the Wakefield Chamber Concerts were resumed. The Gompertz Quartet gave a remarkably fine performance of Tschaïkowsky's Quartet in D (Op. 11), and were also heard in Schumann's Quartet in A (Op. 41, No. 3) and the Scherzo from Cherubini's in E flat. Messrs. Gompertz, Kreuz, and Ould contributed solos for their respective instruments, and Miss Edith Miller sang with much dramatic feeling and intelligence. The time has hardly come for the rush of choral performances, but a couple of early ones have to be chronicled. On the 17th ult. the Bramley Choral Society, under Mr. Alfred Benton, gave Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," Miss Sellars, Miss Thornton, and Mr. Tom Childs being the soloists. And on the same evening the St. Cecilia Society, of Harrogate, also gave Mendelssohn's popular Symphony Cantata, coupled with Professor Stanford's "Revenge." Mr. J. S. Jones was the conductor, and the solos were sung by Miss Wilby, Mrs. Holgate, and Mr. Charles Ellison. The programme also included movements from Symphonies by Beethoven and Schubert, and a Suite for orchestra by Mr. Guy S. Jones, composed specially for the Society.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

At the Opéra here it is the familiar old works which are most frequently performed. On the 3rd ult. Donizetti's "La Favorita" was revived, with Madame Deschamp-Jehin and MM. Alvarez and Renaud in the principal parts. Although considerably faded now-a-days, this class of music still has its admirers among a section of the public.

The Opéra Comique treated us to a reprise of Rossini's "Il Barbiere" on January 25, and on the 10th ult. we had the début of Mdlle. Marie Garnier in "Lakmé." Her voice, although a little thin, told well in the more tender passages. The first performance here of "Le Chevalier d'Harmenthal," by Messager, has been delayed, as the work has had to undergo revision.

As regards the Lamoureux Concerts, and those of M. Colonne, the interest attaching to first performances of new works has recently been wanting here, the two eminent conductors having confined themselves to repeated performances of Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust," which work continues to attract crowded audiences, and the success of which appears to be incapable of becoming exhausted. The Lamoureux Concert of January 19, however, included a first hearing of a poème lyrique by M. Henri Luty, entitled "Stella," set to verses by Victor Hugo, and sung by Mdlle. Passama; a somewhat monotonous composition. At an extra Concert, given on the 13th ult., M. Lamoureux, for the first time, relinquished his conducting bâton in favour of M. Safonoff, the director of the Moscow Conservatoire, who conducted the Fifth Concerto in E flat of Rubinstein, in which M. Lhévinne, a pianist of very great talent, played the solo part. From this circumstance it has been surmised that, after his visit to London, M. Lamoureux would probably go to Russia with his entire orchestra—a conclusion which is at least as premature as such an undertaking would be difficult of realisation.

The Concert of January 19, at the Opéra, was devoted to the young, the very young, musicians, and the general impression was that an artistic enterprise of such importance should be placed at the service of talent of somewhat more pronounced maturity. M. Büsser, in a suite superscribed "à la villa Médicis," and M. Hirschmann, in an orchestral suite, gave proof of talent and of a happy flow of melody. M. Bachelet showed himself a rather more experienced musician in his "Songe de la Sulamite," some portions of which are decidedly interesting. A great success was achieved by the "Prologue" to "Françoise de Rimini," to which the composer, M. Ambroise Thomas, was listening in one of the boxes, receiving an ovation on the part of the audience, which proved to be the last in his long career. At the Opéra Concert of the 9th ult. the programme included M. Lefebvre's "La Sainte Cecile," a very estimable work, no doubt, but somewhat deficient in individuality; the "Poème Carnavalesque" of M. Silver, which seemed to lack the proper spirit; the fine "Rhapsodie Cambodgienne" of M. Bourgault-Ducoudray, which produced an excellent effect; "La Belle au Bois dormant" of M. G. Hue, which contains some very fine parts, one of them, "l'oiseau bleu," being encored; and, finally, a march, with chorus, by Madame de Grandval.

M. d'Harcourt has abandoned the Concert undertaking which he has carried on during the last four years, on account of differences between himself and his orchestra. He is a Society man, very wealthy, and passionately fond of music, which latter taste led him to the building of a Concert-room where he might himself conduct his own orchestra. Finding the enterprise to cause him rather more unpleasantness than pleasure, he withdraws from it, as he has an undoubted right to do.

The Concerts of chamber music here occupy an important place; their number is very great, and they are all interesting! We may instance those of M. Lefort, where Brahms's "Sérénade inutile" was recently greatly applauded; of M. Philippe, where a first performance of the Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello by Bernard has just been given; of M. Parent (Trio by Le Borne); of M. Nadaud (first performance of a "Quintet Fantasie" by Alary); of the Société pour instruments à cordes et à vent (Nonetto, by Naumann, and Ottet, with pianoforte, by Rubinstein). Then there are the Concerts of M. Lederer, solo violinist of the Lamoureux Concerts; those of M. Feesch, a very gifted young violin player; of M. Mendels, with his Concerts intended for students, &c.

As for the pianists, they would, could they be mustered together, form an imposing corps d'armée. Amongst their number we will mention M. Stefanski (American), M. Scriabine (Russian), M. Lockwood (American), M. Schousboe (Danish), M. Litta, M. Lhévinne (Russian), M. Livon (from Marseilles)—all have won the favour of the public, all are applauded, all attract full houses. Particularly interesting, on account of its specialty, was the Concert devoted to compositions for two pianofortes given by M. Paul Brand; as was also that given by Mdlle. Pollack, a young pianist, pupil of Madame Hainl-Poitevin, who may henceforth be ranked amongst our best performers on that instrument.

M. Vidal has been appointed chef d'orchestre at the Opéra, in the room of M. Malier de Montjan, who has resigned.

M. Fissot, whose death has recently occurred, will be replaced in the pianoforte professorship he held at the Conservatoire by M. Pugno, who, on his part, will be succeeded by M. X. Leroux in the class for harmony. The death of Ambroise Thomas is noticed at length in another column.

MUSIC IN AUSTRALIA.

Music is making good progress in Melbourne. On December 17 Sterndale Bennett's cantata "The Woman of Samaria" was performed in the School Hall, by the combined choirs of the South Yarra Presbyterian Church and the South Yarra Musical Society, under their conductor, Mr. Thomas J. Hammond. The solo work was entrusted to Miss Alice King, Miss Marion Porritt, Mr. E. G. Maddocks, and Mr. Thomas Watson; and the accompaniments, arranged for pianoforte and harmonium, were efficiently played by Miss Charlotte Stokes and Mr. Romanis. The second part of the programme contained, among other pieces, Heller's "La Truite," pianoforte solo, played by Miss H. Thompson; Mozart's cavatina, "Porgi amor," artistically sung by Miss Alice King; and the Bridal Chorus from Wagner's "Lohengrin."

The performance in the Cathedral, on December 20, of Spohr's "Last Judgment" attracted a very large congregation. The choir was augmented for the occasion and sang with accuracy, precision, and intelligent expression. The solos were entrusted to Masters Elcoate and Daniell, Messrs. W. F. Wyatt, F. Clutsam, and H. Rofe. No little of the success of the interpretation was due to the skill displayed by Mr. Ernest Wood at the organ. The Cathedral was again crowded on Christmas Eve, when, in addition to excerpts from Handel's "Messiah," several carols were sung, which doubtless revived in the listeners many pleasant memories of the "Old Country." Mr. Wood again proved himself a master of his instrument by his performance of organ solos by Best and Guilmant.

The annual Christmas Concert by the Royal Metropolitan Liedertafel took place on December 23, in the Athenæum, in the presence of a highly appreciative audience. Carols formed a considerable portion of the programme. Solos were admirably sung by Messrs. Rendall, Rofe, and W. A. Chamberlin. Herr Hattenbach contributed violoncello solos, and the renderings by the St. Paul's Cathedral Vocal Quartet Party were deservedly much applauded. Mr. E. Ward conducted with his usual skill, and shared, with Mr. G. B. Fentum, the duties of accompanist.

The Malvern Choral Society, Victoria, eclipsed all its previous efforts at the Concert given on December 20, at which Cowen's "St. John's Eve" was performed, assisted by an orchestra, with Mr. S. A. Ralph as principal. The solo parts of the cantata were sung by Miss Stirling, Miss Catomore, Mr. S. Hall, and Dr. H. Murray, all of whom acquitted themselves with great credit. The choral portions of the work were excellently rendered, and the prolonged applause at the conclusion testified to the satisfaction the performance had given. Mr. J. Hasler conducted.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

The week within which this letter is written will be the last of the regular season at the Metropolitan Opera House, and the list of works to be given will fittingly close a season which, in spite of some defects heretofore alluded to, has no doubt fulfilled all anticipations. The final week began on Sunday evening, the 9th ult., with a performance of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," which was considerably the best attempt at oratorio given at the Metropolitan this winter, with the solo parts allotted to Madame Nordica and Messrs. Lubert, Castelmary, and Plançon. "Die Meistersinger" (in Italian), "Les Huguenots," "Faust," and "Carmen" will follow, and then the rather jaded and pampered opera-going public of New York will have a short period of rest preparatory to the opening of the Damrosch Company (now in Boston) with a season of German opera early in March. This latter season will include "Tristan und Isolde," "Siegfried," "Götterdämmerung," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Meistersinger," "Fidelio," and Mr. Damrosch's "Scarlet Letter."

In orchestral work probably the most important of recent events was the last Concert of the Philharmonic Society, when Tschaïkowsky's first Symphony received a most able and enthusiastic rendering for the first time in New York. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has continued its visits, and the Kneisel and Dannreuther Quartets have had the field of chamber music pretty much to themselves, the latter giving at its last Concert, some three weeks ago, Rubinstein's C minor Quartet, a Prelude and Minuet by Andreoli, and a Quartet by Richard Strauss for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, with Mr. Paolo Gallico at the pianoforte. Mr. Josef Kovarik, the new second violin of this Quartet, is ably filling the place of his predecessor, Mr. Thiele, though quite a young player. The playing of Mr. Sauret does not seem to have awakened the enthusiasm which it deserves. The fact is, he has made the mistake of visiting America at a time when there were already too many solo violinists here before him, and his classical and dignified style does not seem to be duly appreciated by our capricious and spoiled public. At the seven Concerts to be given at the Metropolitan by the Chicago Orchestra, under Mr. Theodore Thomas, the chief compositions will be Beethoven's Seventh and "Eroica," Tschaïkowsky's Sixth, Brahms's Fourth, Schumann's First, Schubert's B minor, and Dvorák's "New World" Symphonies, besides a number of Wagnerian selections. The soloists will be Messrs. Rafael Joseffy, Plunket Greene, Ben Davies, Max Bendix, Bruno Steindel, Edmund Schuecker, and Madame Materna. Mr. Joseffy, by the way, after a five years' absence from the concert platform, has been playing in Philadelphia and Baltimore with the Boston Orchestra.

Among Concert vocalists, Mr. Plunket Greene is, perhaps, holding chief place at the moment, though a very delightful series of Song Recitals by M. Victor Maurel, of the Metropolitan Company, should be mentioned.

This is the season of the year when the waters of Church music begin to be troubled, and already a few important changes, to take effect on May 1, may be noted. One of these is the engagement at the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church of Mr. Harry Rowe Shelley. Mr. Shelley has always been identified with Brooklyn, having at one time been organist for the late Henry Ward Beecher at Plymouth Church. His removal will bring to New York a very brilliant performer and talented composer. He succeeds Mr. Arthur Whiting, who came from Boston last year, and who now retires in order to give his time exclusively to the pianoforte and to teaching. Another important change which is to take place is at the Church of the Incarnation, at Madison Avenue and Thirty-fifth Street, which is one of the richest and most conservative churches in the city. The music there has for the past fourteen years been in charge of Mr. Arthur D. Woodruff, solo tenor and choirmaster, with an excellent staff of soloists and a most admirable choir of about thirty voices. This fine choir is now to be disbanded to make way for a surpliced choir of men and boys, which will be under the direction of Mr. Warren R. Heddon, who comes from the Church of Zion and St. Timothy. He will also retain control of his present choir with a deputy at the organ. It may be mentioned, in passing, that Mr. Woodruff has just been appointed to conduct the Mendelssohn Glee Club for the balance of the season, in the place of the late Joseph Mosenthal. The Church of the Ascension will also probably re-arrange its musical affairs, removing its choir of men and women from the West gallery to the chancel, and vesting them, with a large new organ in place of the present somewhat inadequate instrument.

An inaugural Recital was given on the fine new Jardine organ in the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, on Sunday evening, the 9th ult., in which Dr. Messiter, of Trinity Church, Mr. R. H. Warren, Mr. C. B. Rutenber, Mr. William C. Carl, Dr. Prentice (the organist of St. Mary's), and others took part.

Within a few days steps have been taken by some of the leading organists of New York towards the formation of a guild of American organists. The objects of the proposed organisation are various, but the principal one is the raising of the standard of instrumental and theoretical efficiency, and the securing of a fuller recognition of the importance of the functions of the organist from church authorities. Some of the best men in the country are engaged in the movement, which bids fair to be one of considerable importance.

In Boston the principal theme just now is the German opera, which is being given there by the Damrosch Company preparatory to its coming to New York. The venerable Handel and Haydn Society gave a performance of Verdi's "Manzoni Requiem" on the 2nd ult., with Professor Parker, of Yale College, at the organ, and Mr. B. J. Lang as conductor. Local accounts give this effort of the Society but scant praise.

The city of Newark, New Jersey, a thriving manufacturing centre, only a half-hour's ride from New York, has a Symphony Orchestra. For many years a good deal of excellent choral work has been done in Newark, its Harmonic Society having maintained an existence for an unusually long number of years—as such organisations go in America—and having always kept up a good standard of selection. The Schubert Vocal Society and a later rival—the Newark Madrigal Society—have also done much exceedingly satisfactory work. But instrumental music has not reached any very vigorous development in Newark, probably because of the nearness of that city to New York, which enables its music-lovers to reach all the best entertainments of the metropolis with very little effort and almost no expense. The inauguration of an orchestra of its own therefore marks a distinct advance in the musical development of Newark, and the programme of the first Concert, given on January 24, including Beethoven's Second Symphony, the Schubert "Rosamunde" music, and a number of miscellaneous selections of good order, makes a creditable beginning.

The resignation of Mr. A. C. Monroe from the presidency of the Worcester County Musical Festival Association, of Worcester, Massachusetts, inflicts a serious loss on that body. The Worcester annual Festivals always reach a high plane, and are especially noteworthy because they are given in a rather small manufacturing city, somewhat removed from any large musical centre. They have been conducted for many years by Mr. Carl Zerrahn, of Boston; but much of the financial prosperity has resulted from the efficient management of Mr. Monroe. The Association shows all debts paid and a trust fund of some 7,000 dollars in the treasury—a singularly good exhibit, under the circumstances—and Mr. Monroe feels that he can now properly retire and devote himself to pressing business engagements. It is to be hoped that the Worcester Society will thrive as well under the management of his successor.

On the 11th ult., at Brixton Hall, Mr. Francis A. Fahy delivered what the programme called a Concert-lecture on "Songs of Irish Life." It differed from an ordinary lecture in that there would have been a prodigiously long Concert left for the enjoyment of the crowded and most appreciative audience even if Mr. Fahy had spoken never a word. Twenty-two songs, most of them of four or five verses, make up a liberal programme in themselves. Interspersed as they were on this occasion by explanatory remarks and anecdotes, they formed a veritable "monster programme" of the good old-fashioned type. The songs themselves were mostly new, fourteen of them being by Mrs. J. Needham, who has already made a name as a composer, as Mr. Fahy has as a writer of Irish songs. The "Four Irish Ballads," as well as the very charming "Irish Lullaby" reviewed in this paper some months ago, were included, as well as several of her most recent efforts—e.g., "The brown round wheel," an effective spinning song with an appropriately whirring accompaniment; "The Queen of Connemara," a spirited boat song; "The Donovans," illustrative—in the Gilbert-Sullivan patter style—of Irish hospitality; "Drinking away," a jovial ditty in praise of Irish beer (!), and sundry others by the same clever composer. With these modern specimens of Irish songs were some old favourites by Thomas Moore and Samuel Lover, as well as several of the clever arrangements of old Irish tunes, by Professor Stanford and Mr. Arthur Somervell. We regret our inability to enlarge upon Mr. Fahy's interesting and frequently amusing remarks anent these specimens of the songs of his country and the traits of the Irish character which they reflect; but the mere synopsis of his Lecture would occupy more space than we can spare. The singers included Miss Mabel Berrey, Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Joseph O'Mara, Mr. William Webster, and Signor Foli.

Bach's "Passion" music (according to the text of St. John) was performed at St. Anne's, Soho, for the first time this season, on the 21st ult., under the direction of the organist, Mr. E. H. Thorne. It has for many years been the custom at this church, during Lent—a custom originated by the late Sir Joseph Barnby—to give this setting of the story of the Crucifixion instead of the better known "St. Matthew" music. Though less vigorous than its companion, the "St. John" is quite as rich in devotional feeling and pathos, and as fully deserves a permanent home in London, such as it has obtained in Soho. All the orchestral effects designed by the composer are not possible now-a-days, in consequence of some of the instruments for which he wrote having become obsolete; but the general character of the work was preserved by a band numbering nearly twenty. The choruses were well sung, and the solos were ably given by Mr. Sweeney (Christus), Messrs. Horncastle and Pennington (the Narrators), Mr. Grand, and others. The congregation heartily joined in the chorales. The service was Walmisley's in D minor, and at the close the late Sir Joseph Barnby's hymn, "Jesu, lover of my soul," was sung.

At St. Paul's Cathedral the Festival of the Conversion was celebrated, on January 25, according to custom, by a performance of the greater portion of Mendelssohn's oratorio illustrating the life and mission of the great Apostle. Again the splendid choruses, "Rise up, arise," "O great is the depth," "How lovely are the messengers," and the choral, "Sleepers, awake!" were delivered with unsurpassable effect by the chorus of 250 voices and orchestra of over fifty performers, under the direction of Dr. Martin, the organist being Mr. Macpherson. The soloists were members of the Cathedral Choir. The dignity and devotional feeling pervading "St. Paul," combined with the persuasive power of beautiful (because always appropriate) melody, as usual held spell-bound a congregation filling every portion of the vast Cathedral. The popularity of services of this description is evidently still increasing. Psalms cx., cxii., and cxlvii. were sung to chants by Dr. Crotch, Lamb, and Sir John Stainer respectively, and the setting of the Canticles was by Dr. Steggall.

The Post Office Musical Society reflected credit upon its taste and judgment by choosing for the principal feature of its Concert at Queen's Hall, on the 10th ult., Mr. John Francis Barnett's cantata "The Ancient Mariner." This work, first given at the Birmingham Festival of 1867, contains so much grateful music both for chorus and soloists, that it is rather surprising the opportunities for hearing it are not more frequent in the metropolis. The cantata certainly elicited the closest attention on this occasion and was received with marked approval. Madame Annie Buckland so expressively rendered the tender air "O sleep! it is a gentle thing," that it was with difficulty she evaded the demand for an encore. Madame Annie Marriott and Mr. Charles Chilley also ably discharged their respective duties, and Mr. Sydney Beckley (apologised for on the ground of hoarseness) was the bass soloist. The choral and instrumental portions were steadily performed under the bâton of Mr. Charles Stevens, and Mr. W. A. Soyer was at the organ.

Mr. Albert Fransella's new gold flute, manufactured by Messrs. Rudall, Carte, made its public début at a Concert given by its possessor on the 7th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall. The middle and lower registers of the instrument certainly possess a fine tone, somewhat suggestive of a saxophone, but the instrument must be heard in an orchestra before the artistic value of the adoption of its costly material can be truly gauged. The Concert-giver was heard in Dvorák's Trio in B flat (Op. 21) and in Beethoven's Serenade (Op. 25), but to greater advantage in Goddard's Suite (Op. 116) and in pieces by Chopin, Lefebre, and in two new pieces written for the flute, respectively named "Le Tourbillon" and "Second Impromptu," by Andersen. The vocalists were Miss Regina de Sales and Mr. W. A. Peterkin; the former once more brought forward Purcell's "Nymphs and Shepherds," of which we have heard overmuch of late.

Mr. Bernard Fowles made an excellent selection of chamber compositions for his Concert on the 15th ult., in the Queen's (Small) Hall. The opening work was Schumann's Sonata in A minor for pianoforte and violin (Op. 105), neatly played by the Concert-giver and Mr. Ernest Hopkinson. The abilities of Mr. Fowles as a solo executant found telling exposition in Ferdinand Hiller's "Modern Suite" (Op. 144), the fifth (Alla marcia) of the six movements being rendered with all the requisite point and decision. Mr. Hopkinson's finished performance of Svendsen's Romance for violin was fully entitled to the commendation it obtained. Saint-Saëns's ingenious Variations for two pianofortes upon a theme by Beethoven (Op. 35) was played by Messrs. Ernest Fowles and Bernard Fowles. Imboden's "Wiegenlied" and "Trennung" derived the utmost advantage from the careful singing of Mrs. Mary Davies.

The Hampstead Popular Concert, held at the Vestry Hall on January 31, brought together for Brahms's Quintet in F those capable executants, Messrs. Ludwig, Collins, Gibson, Hobday, and Whitehouse, who developed all the leading features of the work in a thoroughly artistic manner. The first-named violinist had for solo the Adagio from Max Bruch's Second Concerto, a piece excellently qualified to display his command of expression. The pianist was Mr. Leonard Borwick, who distinguished himself in an Intermezzo by Arensky and a Prelude by Rachmaninoff, besides uniting with Mr. Whitehouse in a fine performance of Beethoven's Sonata in A for their respective instruments. Mr. David Bispham did the fullest justice to Dvorák's "By the Waters of Babylon," to a couple of Gipsy Songs from the same pen, and to the voice part in Mr. H. Walford Davies's lofty setting of Browning's "Prospice," with string quartet.

Miss Rosalind Ellicott gave a Concert of her chamber music on the 12th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall. Chief interest was perhaps attached to a Pianoforte Trio in D minor, a work which, in common with others by this talented composer, displays loftiness of aim and artistic workmanship combined with considerable melodic charm. The programme also included the Pianoforte Trio in G and the pleasing Sonata in D for pianoforte and violin, which was most effectively played by Miss Sybil Palliser and Mr. Richard Gompertz. The last-named artist, assisted by Miss Ellicott at the pianoforte, also gave an effective rendering of a charming Romance and vivacious Polonaise, and also took part in the trios with Signor Piatti. Very welcome variety was given by Mr. David Bispham, who sang five songs by the Concert-giver, the best of which was entitled "Aus meinen Thränen." The Concert was largely attended."

Three of our leading amateur orchestral societies gave Concerts in quick succession at the Queen's Hall during the past month, the Royal Amateurs on the 12th, the Strolling Players on the 13th, and the Stock Exchange on the 18th ult. Of these the last-named was the most interesting the players maintaining the high standard of efficiency they have reached under the direction of Mr. George Kitchin. The programme included Schubert's bright and Mozart-like Symphony in C (No. 6); Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto, played in a refined, if not very forcible manner by Miss Elizabeth Torrens-Johnson; a new and, on the whole, very effective Overture to "Othello," by Mr. Walter Macfarren, conducted by the composer; and Massenet's ballet music to "Le Cid." The male-voice choir rendered some part-songs with admirable finish, and Mrs. Helen Trust was alike happy in her choice of songs and in their execution.

At Trinity College, on the 4th ult., there was a Recital by Messrs. H. and G. Saint-George, of compositions for the viol d'amore and viol da gamba, the object being to exhibit the special characteristics of these ancient instruments in suitable music. The oldest pieces for the viol da gamba were an air and saraband by John Jenkins (about 1630) and a musette by De Caix d'Hervelois (dating back to 1683). These proved by no means ineffective works. A series of movements by A. Ariosti (1712) for the viol d'amore and an Adagio by Roland Marais (about 1720) were also particularly interesting compositions. The Messrs. Saint-George manifested complete knowledge of the resources of their instruments and throughout played with feeling. To diversify the programme, Miss Janie Bridges sang (with notable grace and refinement) airs by Cowen and Denza.

The funeral of Lord Leighton took place at St. Paul's Cathedral, on the 3rd ult., with impressing solemnity. Musicians owe a debt to the late President of the Royal Academy of Arts, for he was the first to publicly recognise music in his office as one of the fine arts. The anthem was "Blessed are they that mourn," set to music by Brahms; Purcell contributed the strains to "Thou knowest, Lord, the secrets of our hearts." Professor Villiers Stanford was drawn upon for a setting of "I heard a voice from heaven," and Beethoven's "Equale" for four trombones was played for the first time at a Church Service in England, by Messrs. Case, Hatfield, A. and J. Matt. The wide views and appreciative musical taste of the late great artist were admirably indicated in the above selection, which was rendered with the utmost impressiveness.

An international competition has been opened by our Milan contemporary, Il Teatro, for the composition of a one-act Opera, with prizes of 3,000, 1,500, 1,000, and 500 francs respectively, and an additional 1,000 francs for the most approved libretto, which must be written in Italian. The money has already been deposited with a banker. No restriction is made as to age or nationality, and the proprietorship of the successful works remains with their respective authors. M. Gagon Steiner, the actual promoter of the scheme, moreover guarantees the performance in Vienna, during the Exhibition to be opened there next June, of six of the scores most approved of by a competent jury. Intending competitors may obtain all further information on application to the directors of the journal, Il Teatro, No. 3, via San Rafaele, Milan.

The forthcoming Festival performances at Bayreuth are announced to take place as follows: There will be five series of representations of "Der Ring des Nibelungen," from July 19 to August 19—viz., "Das Rheingold," on July 19 and 26, August 2, 9, and 16; "Die Walküre," on July 20, 27, August 3, 10, and 17; "Siegfried," on July 21 and 28, August 4, 11, and 18; "Götterdämmerung," on July 22 and 29, August 5, 12, and 19. The performances of "Das Rheingold" are to commence at five o'clock in the afternoon; those of the other parts of the Tetralogy at four o'clock. The price of a numbered stall for each series is eighty marks. Tickets may be obtained and lodgings secured (for which purpose a special committee has been formed, as in former years) by communicating with Herr A. von Gross, Bayreuth, Bavaria.

The National Sunday League Concert at Queen's Hall, on the 9th ult., was in memory of Sir Joseph Barnby. The lamented musician was represented in the programme by his expressive oratorio "Rebekah," the anthem "Grant to us, Lord," and the motet "King all glorious," the efficient performance of each of which evoked the utmost admiration and respect of a densely crowded assemblage. The soloists in the oratorio were Madame Emily Squire, Mr. Joseph O'Mara, and Mr. D. Price (the latter in lieu of Mr. R. Hilton), with whom in those moving quartets, Sterndale Bennett's "God is a Spirit" and Spohr's "Blest are the departed," was associated Madame Belle Cole. Sir Arthur Sullivan's noble "In Memoriam" Overture exercised its accustomed influence upon attentive listeners.

The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company concluded its brief London season at Daly's Theatre on the 15th ult. The works mounted since our notice of last month were "The Daughter of the Regiment," "Faust," "The Flying Dutchman," "Hansel and Gretel," "Pagliacci," and "Cavalleria Rusticana," concerning the performances of which it is only necessary to say that the excellence of ensemble which distinguished the renderings of the operas previously given was fully maintained. The announcement that this company has arranged for an annual London season at Christmastide will doubtless be welcomed by all music-lovers in the metropolis, for it is not too much to say that no operatic performances of late years have been more thoroughly enjoyable.

At a largely attended meeting of the London Tonic Sol-fa Association, on the 15th ult., presided over by Mr. T. H. Brooke Hitching, chairman of the Guildhall School of Music, a warm tribute was made to the memory of the late Sir Joseph Barnby. Mr. John Graham, a member of the Royal Choral Society, gave a sketch of the late conductor's life and dwelt upon his characteristics as a conductor and worker. Mr. Graham said that he had great self-possession, a ready tongue, and a large grasp. He was determined and firm, and generous to a fault. He set an example of devotion to duty, especially in regard to the Royal Choral Society, which was as dear to him as a favourite child.

On Saturday, the 15th ult., the Bishop of London consecrated the new church, dedicated to St. Anselm, which has been erected in Davies Street, Berkeley Square, to replace Hanover Chapel, Regent Street, which is about to be pulled down. The music for the Communion Service was specially composed for the occasion by the organist, Mr. David J. Thomas, who has had the direction of the Welsh services at All Saints', Margaret Street, and St. Paul's Cathedral. The music was of a most impressive character and was effectively and reverently sung by the choir, who gave evidence throughout of careful training,

On the 22nd ult. the old choirboys of Westminster Abbey held their fifth annual Dinner at the Victoria Mansions Restaurant, Westminster, Mr. Charles Strong in the chair. During the evening Mr. Arthur Beckham, the secretary, was presented, by Dr. Bridge, on behalf of the members of the Club, with a handsome spirit case in oak and silver frame, suitably inscribed, in recognition of the able manner in which Mr. Beckham's duties had been performed, and of the kindly feelings existing between him and the members. An excellent musical entertainment was given, under the direction of Mr. H. J. Moodie.

The Concert given by the Imperial Institute Amateur Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Randegger, on the 12th ult., was very largely attended. A praiseworthy performance of Haydn's genial Symphony in C was the most successful effort of the executants. Miss Sybil Palliser gave a delightfully refined and finished rendering of the pianoforte part of Mendelssohn's familiar Concerto in G minor, and Madame Clara Poole sang "O ma lyre immortelle," from Gounod's opera "Sapho," with dramatic appreciation of the music. The Concert was concluded by Sullivan's melodious and vivacious overture, "Di Ballo."

Mr. H. Davan Wetton gave, on the 12th ult., at Trinity College, an instructive and well thought out Lecture on "Choir-training." He dwelt upon the necessity of all organists being carefully taught how to train a choir, which was of equal importance to the acquirement of command of the organ. Professor Bridge's "Musical Gestures" were recommended as an expeditious and effective method of teaching boys the Staff notation, and much practical information was given concerning the production of boys' voices and management of a church choir.

On Monday night, the 10th ult., a very interesting Lecture was given by Mr. J. Day Talbot at Collyer Hall, High Street, Peckham. The subject was "Franz Schubert: his life and works." During the evening selections from the composer's works were played by Mr. Fuller and Miss Alice Fuller (violin), Mr. T. H. Bertenshaw and Mr. J. Day Talbot (pianoforte), and Mr. H. F. Thornton (violoncello); and songs were contributed by Miss Clarissa Talbot, Mr. Herbert Williams, and Mr. J. W. Stubbings. Mr. Talbot accompanied the songs.

The West Ham Choral Society gave a performance, on January 30, at the Town Hall, Stratford, of Handel's oratorio "Judas Maccabæus," which was largely attended. The principals were Madame Marie Mallia, Madame Emlyn Jones, Mr. C. Emlyn Jones, and Mr. Robert Hilton, whose efforts were ably seconded by a chorus and orchestra of about a hundred and twenty performers. Mr. G. B. Gilbert presided at the organ, and Mr. W. Harding Bonner conducted with his usual ability.

The processional music played by the bands of the Isle of Wight Volunteers, the Scottish Rifles, and the Royal Marine Light Infantry at the funeral of the late Prince Henry of Battenberg, on the 5th ult., included the March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Chopin's Funeral March, and an impressive "Solemn March," composed for the occasion by Mr. George Miller, bandmaster of the Royal Marine Light Infantry.

Mr. Robert Newman, of Queen's Hall, has arranged to bring to England, next month, M. Lamoureux and his famous orchestra, from Paris. Three Concerts will take place at Queen's Hall, on April 13, 16, and 18, and others will also be given in the provinces. M. Lamoureux conducted two Concerts in London in 1881, but his orchestra has not hitherto crossed the Channel.

Miss Florence May recently gave a very successful Pianoforte Recital in Vienna, at which Sir Edmond and Lady Monson were present. She also took part in one of the Concerts of the "Musik und Theater Gesellschaft," when, by special request of the committee, she played the Paganini-Brahms Variations and her own "Six short Waltzes" to a highly appreciative audience.

On the 2nd ult. an illustrated Lecture was given by Mr. Ashcroft, at that splendid church, popularly known as Stepney Meeting House, on "Handel and his friends." As illustrations "Total eclipse" was sung with great pathos by Mr. Lester Jones, and Miss Kate Nicholls rendered "Let the bright Seraphim" in splendid style. Mr. R. D. Metcalfe officiated at the organ, and Mr. Kennedy at the pianoforte.

The German Emperor has conferred the title of Royal Professor on Mr. Alfred Blume, who recently resigned his appointment at the Royal College of Music. Professor Blume will in future reside at Wiesbaden, but will keep up his connection in this country by returning annually for the regular London season.

Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was given at Holy Trinity Church, Marylebone, on Thursday evening, January 30, under the direction of Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, choirmaster of the church, who also played the accompaniments. The soloists were Master Coles, Miss Prudence Nice, Mr. Gilbert Denis, and Mr. Frederick Winton.

We understand that Lady Stewart, who is preparing a Memoir of her late husband, Sir Robert Stewart, will be glad to have the loan of any letters or reminiscences which friends of the deceased musician may possess. They should be addressed to her at 66, Upper Leeson Street, Dublin, and will be promptly returned.

Mendelssohn's Ninety-fifth Psalm was sung at a special Service at Holy Trinity Church, Barnes, on the 12th ult., with Mr. Edward Wilkinson as principal tenor. Mr. W. J. Walker, the organist of the church, accompanied, and the performance was conducted by Mr. H. Scott.

Mr. Nikisch will give two Orchestral Concerts at St. James's Hall on the evenings of April 20 and May 4. These will be his only appearances in London this season.

OBITUARY.

HENRY LESLIE.

There is a wide contrast between the circumstances under which Joseph Barnby passed away and those attending the departure of Henry David Leslie. In the one case, a strong man was struck down with his hands full of work; in the other, a musician left the world who had practically ceased to have any concern in it, and whom the world, on its part, had well-nigh forgotten. We very soon forget in these days of absorbing interests, when the concerns of every twenty-four hours occupy every minute of the time. At moments, perhaps, we remembered that somewhere down in Wales lived a gentleman once conspicuous in music, and then the tide of current events once more washed the memory away. But now that Henry Leslie has passed from among the quick and joined the dead, it is fitting that a tribute be laid upon his tomb.

Leslie was born in London on June 18, 1822, and, showing musical sympathies, was trained in the art by Charles Lucas. He first appeared as an amateur violoncellist at the Concerts of the Sacred Harmonic Society and others. But as the circumstances of his life were fortunate, and he had ambition, he was not likely to rest content with a place among the rank and file. Nothing less than the honours of composer and conductor would satisfy him, and these, in varying measure, he succeeded in obtaining, chiefly by his faculty for "pegging away." No man worked more steadily, or more completely kept his end in view, by which means, though lacking brilliant talents, he gained an eminent place. Leslie's work as a conductor is chiefly associated with the exceptional Choir which bore his name, but his energies were by no means restricted to that organisation. He began with the bâton upon the Amateur Musical Society, 1847-61, and, later, occupied the conductor's seat of the Herefordshire Philharmonic, the Guild of Amateur Musicians, &c. But these engagements were wholly subordinate to his post as head of "Henry Leslie's Choir," where his name was made by the achievement of very remarkable results. We shall not discuss here the origin of that Choir. It is enough that Leslie was concerned in its early stages, and that, in 1855, when re-organisation took place, he assumed the direction and bestowed his name upon the enterprise. Nor need we apportion with minute care the credit due respectively to Mr. Heming, the chorusmaster, and the conductor. There is ample glory for both in the brilliant record of the Choir. Leslie's success in this position seems to have been due to a faculty for taking pains. He did not disdain to plod and, it is said, would rehearse a madrigal or part-song for months, till no blemish could be found in its rendering. That was his best and wisest course, and it is to his credit that he persevered in it. But Leslie was less wise in leading his Choir outside unaccompanied part-music into the uncongenial region of oratorio and concerts of mixed works. A greater mistake was never made. The Choir resented it, and the first rift within a very precious lute began to show itself. In the end, Leslie resigned (1880) and the Choir broke up. Its re-organisation, under Mr. Randegger, and a subsequent attempt to revive it under Leslie, were foredoomed to failure. The opportunity had passed and did not return. Leslie retired to an estate in Wales after this, and, for a few years, busied himself in promoting music among his neighbours; but his health failed, he went into complete retirement, and died on February 4 last, at the age of seventy-four,

It avails little to speak of Leslie as a composer. His best works were connected with his own special department and will long survive him in right of absolute beauty and fitness. But his larger compositions were much less successful. "Immanuel," "Judith," "Ida," "Holyrood," and "The Daughter of the Isles" have not survived changes in taste. "Memory," "The Pilgrims," and their companions will remain as the composer's monument.

Death has been unusually active during the last few weeks in the ranks of the musical profession and those connected therewith. We have still to record the demise, on January 22, at Croydon, of Mr. Henry Moore, senior partner and founder, in 1838, of the firm of Moore and Moore, of Bishopsgate Street, London. The deceased was in his eighty-third year.

In the sudden death of Mr. George Watson, on the 15th ult., the Royal College of Music has lost a faithful and singularly able servitor, whose place will be difficult to fill. The deceased was born in 1849, and his remarkable talent for organisation and management may be said to have first shown itself in the fulfilment of his duties as secretary to the Rochester, Chatham, and Strood Choral Society. When the Royal College of Music was founded by the Prince of Wales, in 1882, Mr. Watson was engaged as organising secretary. He became chief clerk in 1883, registrar in 1884, and finally secretary, when the College was transferred to the new building in 1894. During the whole of this time his labours for the College were incessant, and, although he had no scientific or professional acquaintance with music, yet the influence of his energy, ability, and constant activity was felt more or less in every department of the Institution. When the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music was founded in 1889, under the presidency of the Prince of Wales, Mr. Watson became its secretary and organiser, and it is to him, under the countenance of the Board, that the extraordinary progress which that Institution has made is practically due. The large and representative attendance at his funeral, which took place on the 19th ult., at Fulham Cemetery, testified to the widespread esteem in which he was personally held.

The death is announced, on January 29, at Paris, of Jules Bordier, the distinguished composer, at the age of forty-nine. He wrote several symphonic poems, a "Méditation" on the Seventh Prelude by Bach, Hungarian Dances, and other instrumental pieces, including a "Danse Macabre" for violin, made popular by M. Ysaye, as well as the music to Alfred de Vigny's "Chatterton" and two operas—viz., "Nadia," produced some years ago in Paris and Geneva, and "Le Fiancé de la Mer," brought out not long since in Rouen. M. Bordier was the founder of the Association Artistique in Angers, an excellent concert institution, the orchestra of which he partly maintained at his own expense, and which for a period of over ten years rendered yeoman service to composers of the modern French and Belgian schools — Saint-Saëns, Massenet, César Franck, Peter Benoit, and others—in obtaining a first hearing for their works. He was also an early champion of Wagner's music in the French provinces. In 1893 he retired from the Angers institution and associated himself with a music publishing firm in Paris.

On the same day, January 29, the death occurred in Paris of Henri Fissot, aged fifty-three, organist and pianist of considerable repute, and professor of one of the most important pianoforte classes at the French Conservatoire. For many years he held the appointment of organist at the Church of St. Vincent de Paul. His numerous compositions for the pianoforte, distinguished by a graceful style and delicate workmanship, are much esteemed by French amateurs.

Madame Dorus-Gras, the once celebrated prima donna, died in Paris on the 6th ult., at the advanced age of eighty-nine. She was the original representative of Alice, in "Robert le Diable"; Marguerite, in "Les Huguenots"; Theresina, in Auber's "Le Philtre"; and Eudoxie, in "La Juive." In 1850 Mdlle Dorus, who some years previously had married a violinist of the Opéra, M. Gras, quitted the operatic stage, and has since lived in retirement on some property of her own in the vicinity of Paris.

One of the most distinguished Russian prime donne, Madame Dapya Mikaïlovna Leonova, died last month at St. Petersburg, at the age of sixty-two. A pupil of Glinka, with whose operas, "La vie pour le Tsar" and "Rousslan et Loudmilla," her name came to be more particularly associated, she made her début at the Imperial Russian Opera in 1851, where for a quarter of a century she enjoyed an enormous popularity. In 1879 Madame Leonova undertook what proved to be a most brilliant tour as prima donna through Asiatic Russia, Japan, and America, in the course of which, however, she contracted an obstinate throat complaint, which forced her to relinquish the operatic stage.

Dr. Coutagne, a musical author of considerable merit, died recently, at Lyons. He was a medical man by profession, but had long been occupied chiefly with the cultivation of music and musical research. As a result of the latter, he published a learned and valuable monograph, entitled "Duiffoproucart et les luthiers lyonnais du XVI^me^ Siècle," and he is also the author of an interesting volume, "Le Drame Wagnerien et Bayreuth." Under the pseudonym of Paul Claës, Dr. Coutagne also made himself favourably known as a composer, several orchestral compositions from his pen having been more especially successful.

Jules Buschop, the doyen of Belgian composers, died, at Bruges, on the 10th ult. Born at Paris, in 1810, of an aristocratic Belgian family, he was the first to obtain the grand musical prize instituted, in 1834, by the Belgian Government in imitation of the Prix de Rome of France. Among his compositions may be instanced a Te Deum, first produced in 1860, in Brussels; a cantata for the inauguration of the statue of Simon Stevin; an opera, "La Toison d'or"; several masses and symphonic pieces. He also published, a few years since, a volume of verses under the title of "Miscellanées poétiques."

The death is announced, on January 24, at Naples, of Michele Ruta, a highly esteemed composer and musical author. He was born, in 1827, at Caserta, the scion of a family of musicians, and studied at the Naples Conservatorio under Lanza, Crescentini, and others. In 1853 he made his début as a dramatic composer at Naples with an opera, "Leonilda." Other operatic works from his pen followed in quick succession, amongst the most successful of which, nearly all first produced at Naples, were a "Faust," "La Notte di San Bartolomeo," "Antonio Foscarini," and "La Griselda." He also wrote a Te Deum, a number of masses and motets, and, amongst his theoretical works, a Treatise on Harmony is much esteemed. The deceased artist was the musical editor of the Corriere del Mattino, and the founder and editor of a journal entitled La Musica.

An operatic vocalist, who has enjoyed great popularity in Italy and other Continental countries, Signora Luigia Abbadia, died recently at Rome, aged seventy-four.

The death is announced, recently, at Zurich, at the age of eighty, of Dr. Franz Wille, the husband of Frau Elisa Wille, the friend of Wagner, whose interesting and valuable correspondence with the poet-composer was published some years since. Dr. Wille was, in his younger days, a leading journalist of pronounced liberal opinions at Hamburg, and his villa, "Mariafeld," by the lake of Zurich, constituted for many years a rendezvous for musical and other artists of all nationalities. To Franz Liszt, who in 1882 paid his last visit to the hospitable house, the master thereof was heard to remark during dinner: "Among my most intimate friends, the greatest were Heine, Bismarck, and thou. Heine was a great artist, but by no means a hero; the other a great hero, but not an artist; thou alone, Franz, art both an artist and a hero."

Count Eberhard of Wurtemberg, a grandson of the Duke Wilhelm of Wurtemberg and his morganatic consort, the Baroness Tunderfeld, died on January 24, at Vienna, at the age of sixty-six. He was an accomplished musician and the composer of numerous musical pieces, amongst them a number of marches, including the "Tegethof" March and the "Alexander" March, which obtained great popularity and have been permanently adopted in the repertory of Austrian and German military bands.

Friedrich Hilpert, the eminent violoncellist, member and co-founder, with Jean Becker, of the once famous Florentine Quartet, died on the 5th ult., at Munich, aged fifty-five.

The founder of the famous factory of brass instruments, Cerveny and Sons, of Königgrätz, V. F. Cerveny, died at that town on January 19, in his seventy-sixth year. He was a native of Bohemia, and his numerous ingenious inventions and improvements have been adopted in most music-cultivating countries.

The second daughter of Meyerbeer, the Baroness von Korff, died recently at Rome, in her sixty-fourth year. She was married to a general in the Prussian army, and her only son is an officer in a cavalry regiment stationed at Metz.

We have also to record the following deaths:—On January 7, at Forli, near Rome, Luigi Guerra Gazzagoni, organist, highly esteemed throughout the Romagna, in his eightieth year.

On January 10, at New York, Joseph Mosenthal, organist and conductor of several choral societies, aged sixty-two.

On January 13, at St. Louis (U.S.), Rupert Fahrenbach, composer and director of a choral society, a native of Baden.

Recently, at Barbizon, Madame Sainte-Foy, once a popular vocalist at the Paris Opéra Comique, afterwards an esteemed concert singer and teacher, aged seventy-nine.

On January 15, at Paris, Eugène Joseph Courjon, Rajah of Chandernagor, distinguished amateur and composer of merit, aged fifty-three.

Recently, at New York, Frank E. Sawyer, composer of much promise, aged twenty-four.

On January 17, at Verviers, Madame Elise Grandjean, distinguished pianist, aged seventy-two.

Recently, at Grunewald, near Berlin, Frau Jenny Mauthner, as Frl. Ehrenberg well-known and esteemed pianist.

On January 18, at Charlottenburg, near Berlin, Leander Posse, for many years director of the Elberfeld Instrumental Verein, excellent violinist and teacher.

On January 22, at Basle, August Walter Strauss, for over fifty years highly-esteemed local conductor and teacher, aged seventy-four.

On January 28, at Salzwedel, Friedrich Gartz, composer of numerous popular choral works and songs, aged seventy-one.

Recently, at Loreto, Alessandro Zoboli, once popular basso-comico, also for several seasons of the London Royal Italian Opera, aged sixty-eight.

Recently, at Frankfort-on-Main, Adolf Auerbach, formerly celebrated tenor, particularly in Wagnerian parts, in his seventieth year.

On the 8th ult., at Vienna, Hugo Schenck, for a number of years Capellmeister at the Theater-an-der-Wien, aged forty-four.

HIGH CLASS SONGS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—We have been much interested in your remarks in this month's Musical Times upon the subject of "high class" songs and their failure to find due appreciation.

The enclosed catalogue recently issued by us will give you some idea of the labour and outlay we have been at (so far completely unreturned) during the last three or four years in the cause now about to be espoused, according to your article, by the prominent English composers mentioned by you, some of whom—viz., Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Mr. Cowen, and Mr. Hamish MacCunn—with other prominent writers, such as, for instance, Miss Maude Valérie White, Miss Frances Allitsen, Lady Parkyns (Beatrice Parkyns), Miss E. Overbeck, Miss F. E. Gambogi, Miss Amy Elise Horrocks, Mr. Tivadar Nachèz, Mr. David Popper, Mr. Lawrence Kellie, Mr. Stanley Hawley, Signor Emilio Pizzi, and others, have written high class songs for us.

Our experience has not been an encouraging one. The public has not, to any appreciable extent, responded to our efforts, and vocalists, with a few praiseworthy exceptions, while speaking enthusiastically of our "specially selected" songs, decline to sing them without being paid for so doing. While the popular taste remains as it is, publishers are obviously unable to expend large sums in paying vocalists to sing what their audiences do not want and are unable to appreciate. When vocalists will be satisfied with their concert engagement fees and sing high class songs for the love of their art, then we may reasonably hope for a better state of things to prevail; but, until then, the publishers of "artistic" work must content themselves with the thought that they are devoting energy and capital towards bringing about this much desired improvement, for that is all the compensation they are likely to get at present.

Trusting you may be able to find space in your columns for this letter.—We are, Sir, yours faithfully,

Robert Cocks & Co.

Basingstoke.—On the 3rd ult. the Harmonic Society gave, in the Town Hall, a fine performance of Mendelssohn's "Athalie." The soloists were Miss M. Purvis, Miss E. Stubbs, and Miss M. Reeve, with Miss B. Wills Chandler as reciter. Mr. J. S. Liddle was principal of the orchestra, and Mr. W. H. Liddle conducted. Liddle, and the performance of Max Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," the violoncello solo part of which was played by Miss Kingsmill.

Cowen's cantata the "Sleeping Beauty," the soloists in which were Miss T. Crowdy, Miss D. Barnard, Mr. H. Partridge, and Mr. R. T. A. Hughes, who all acquitted themselves admirably in their respective parts. The orchestra was ably led by Miss B. Heginbotham. In a miscellaneous second part a pianoforte solo was played by Miss J. Hoskins, songs were contributed by the above-mentioned vocalists and Dr. Coombs, and a violin trio was rendered by Misses Heginbotham, M. Bennett, and M. Coombs.

Burton-on-Trent.—On the 5th ult. the Musical Society gave a successful performance of "Samson," as a complimentary Concert to Mr. L. F. Day, on his retirement after forty years' honorary conductorship. The principal vocalists were Miss Thudichum, Miss Frances Turner, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. Mr. H. T. Abbott led the orchestra and Mr. W. Stewart Dove was at the organ. Mr. Day once again conducted with his usual skill, and the crowded audience testified their appreciation of the veteran conductor's efforts. A feature of the performance was the excellence of the chorus singing.

Calverley.—After a suspension of nearly three years the Choral Society made its re-appearance in public on the 1st ult., at the Mechanics' Institute. Excellent performances were given of Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and great praise is due to the Rev. L. Smith, who has re-organised the Society, and to Mr. James Hall, whose services have again been secured. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Ashworth, Miss M. Hardy, Mr. C. Blagbro, and Mr. Cookson. The accompaniments were played by a small orchestra of strings led by Mr. J. Evers, assisted by Mr. H. Hartley at the pianoforte and Mr. A. Grimshaw at the harmonium.

Cardiff.—The second Concert this season of the Musical Society, which took place on the 7th ult., in the Park Hall, was largely attended. The programme included Hamish MacCunn's "Lord Ullin's Daughter," the "Tannhäuser" Overture, and a number of songs, which were finely sung by Miss Esther Palliser and Mr. David Bispham. Mr. Oscar Meyer's brilliant pianoforte playing was also greatly appreciated.

Chichester.—At the ceremony of the enthronement of Bishop E. R. Wilberforce, on January 28, Purcell's Te Deum was sung with accompaniment of organ, strings, and trumpets; and the anthem was Mendelssohn's "How lovely are the messengers," accompanied by organ and strings.

Chigwell.—An orchestra was used at Choral Evensong at the Dedication Festival of the Parish Church, on the 2nd ult. Mackenzie's Benedictus was played as an opening voluntary, and the service list included Stanford's Evening Service in A (for double choir) and Spohr's "How lovely are Thy dwellings fair," &c. On the previous day, at the dedication of a new reredos window and pulpit, an augmented choir gave impressive renderings of Myles B. Foster's Service in A and Spohr's "Blest are the departed," under the direction of Mr. H. Riding.

Hastings.—At the opening of the fine new organ at Holy Trinity Church, containing fifty stops, built by Norman, Brothers and Beard, on the 18th ult., Dean Farrar preached an eloquent sermon on "Church Music." Mr. H. Goss Custard presided at the organ, and gave Recitals in the afternoon and evening, at which the manifold resources of the instrument were admirably displayed.

Invercargill (N.Z.).—The Choral Union, conducted by Mr. Charles Gray, gave the last Concert of its fifth series at the Theatre Royal, on December 10, when "The Messiah" was sung in an admirable manner. The soloists were the Misses Ross, Organ, Geddes, M. Robinson, M. McDonald, Mrs. H. A. McDonald, Mr. E. Lovell, and Mr. J. E. Taylor. Mr. H. Cottier played the obbligato to "The trumpet shall sound" in a most effective manner, and great credit is due to Miss Lithgow for her admirable assistance at the pianoforte. Mr. D. Blue was the principal violin of an efficient orchestra.

Kettering.—Mr. C. Hillyer gave a successful Concert in the Victoria Hall on the 10th ult. Miss Agnes Walker's excellent rendering of songs by Mattei, Sullivan, and Henschel was fully appreciated, as also were the pianoforte playing by the Concert-giver and harp solos contributed by Mr. G. T. Miles. The Meister Glee Singers completed the list of executants.

Newark.—The appointment of Mr. W. T. Wright as conductor of the Philharmonic Society was fully justified by the excellence of the performance of Handel's "Acis and Galatea," which was given by the Society on the 4th ult., in the Town Hall. The soloists were Miss C. Yorke, Mr. E. Kemp, Mr. D. Harrison, and Mr. E. Simpson. In a miscellaneous second part the executants also included Madame d'Ascaino (pianist), Mr. Hellier (flautist), and Mr. Challen (clarinettist).

Newbury.—An excellent Concert was given on January 31, in the Town Hall, by the Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Liddle. The programme chiefly consisted of part-songs, which were meritoriously rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss C. Lowe, Miss A. Wintle, Miss Ravenor, and Mr. C. M. Child. The Andante from Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in C minor was played by Miss Arkwright, Mr. Liddle, and Miss Kingsmill; the last-named lady also contributing violoncello solos by Fitzenhagen and Saint-Saëns.

Newport (Shropshire).—The Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Smart, gave a highly successful performance of Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" on the 17th ult., in the Town Hall. Miss L. Bellamy, Miss M. Hackett, Mr. C. W. Fredericks, and Mr. W. J. Ineson were the solo vocalists, each of whom also sang in the second part of the programme. Mr. Hood was principal violinist of a capable orchestra, which contributed the "Lac des Fées" and "William Tell" Overtures, besides the accompanimenst to the cantata. The choruses were admirably rendered. A prominent feature of the evening was the solo violin playing of Mr. P. H. Miles.

Peasenhall, Suffolk.—An admirable rendering of Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" was given by the Church Choir on January 26. The choice of so important a work by a country choir was, no doubt, a somewhat adventurous policy, but was entirely justified by the result, every difficulty being easily overcome, and a smooth and finished reading secured. Miss Collett sang the solo with great expression and excellent judgment. The Rev. E. A. Cooke, vicar of the parish, was at the organ.

Pemberton, near Wigan.—The Pemberton and District Choral Society, formed in September last, held its first Concert, on the 5th ult., when the oratorio "The Captives of Babylon," by George Shinn, was given by a chorus and orchestra of one hundred performers. The solos were sung by Miss F. Heenan, Miss L. Behrens, Mr. G. Green, and Mr. W. Sweetman. Mr. J. H. Aldred conducted.

Reading.—The January Concert of the Orpheus Society was of special interest. The Oxford Gleemen joined forces with the Reading Society, and the combined chorus of nearly one hundred men sang Cooke's "Strike the lyre," Callcott's "Queen of the valley," "Grieg's "Länderkennung," "The Pilgrims' Chorus" ("Tannhäuser"), and Balfe's "Task is ended." Dr. C. H. Lloyd conducted his "Fly to my mistress," and Sir Walter Parratt played Rheinberger's First Organ Concerto. There was a band of forty, with Mr. A. Burnett as principal first violin. Miss Mary Harris and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint sang solos, and Dr. F. J. Read conducted.

Rhyl.—On the 9th ult., at St. John's Church, there was an orchestral accompaniment to the evening service, and also a short Organ Recital by Mr. A. E. Jones. The programme consisted of excerpts from the following composers: Handel, Mendelssohn, Bervon, Guilmant, Driffield, and Mullineux. The anthems were "Break forth into joy" (Simper) and the Gloria from Mozart's Twelfth Mass. Mr. J. D. Asher, organist of St. John's, conducted with his usual ability.

St. George's, Salop.—On January 27 the first Concert of the season was given by the Choral Union, in the large dining hall of the Lilleshall Iron Company's Works, by a band and chorus of about ninety executants. The first part of the programme was selected from the works of Mendelssohn, and included the "War March" (Athalie), the "Forty-Second Psalm," and "Hear my Prayer," the soloist in the last-named being Miss L. Bellamy. An excellent orchestra rendered the accompaniments in a capable manner, and also played a selection from "Der Freischütz." Mr. Fred. Ward contributed some violin pieces, and Mr. F. A. Ward gave some violoncello solos with much acceptance. The chorus singing was very praiseworthy, especially for so young a society. Mr. Charles Watkiss was principal violinist, and Mr. Smart conducted.

Tenbury.—An Instrumental and Vocal Concert was given at the Corn Exchange Hall, on the 13th ult., before an appreciative audience, by Miss A. Hobdell (organist of the Parish Church) and Mr. G. Kington, assisted by Mrs. W. F. Joyce. Glees were well rendered by the choir, and solos were contributed by Miss A. Hobdell (pianoforte), Mr. Kington (violin), and Mrs. W. F. Joyce (violoncello).

Ventnor, Isle of Wight.—The thirty-seventh annual Concert of the Choral Society took place, on the 12th ult., in the Assembly Rooms. The work chosen was the "Elijah," in which the solo parts were sung by Miss B. Gough, Miss A. Carter, Mr. E. Jones, and Mr. A. Barlow. Mr. S. Hawley presided at the organ, Mr. E. H. Lemare at the pianoforte, Mr. J. S. Smith was first violin, and Mr. Lemare conducted.

Wellington (New Zealand).—On December 16, at the Opera House, Mr. Maughan Barnett's Musical Society performed Handel's "The Messiah" to a crowded and enthusiastic audience. The orchestra consisted of some thirty-five performers, and a chorus of over 200. The principals were Miss Parsons, Madame E. Carlton, Mr. J. W. Hill, and Mr. John Prouse. Mr. Alfred F. Hill presided at the organ, and Mr. M. Barnett conducted. The performance was a great success, and reflected the highest credit on all concerned in the production.

Wolverhampton.—The third and concluding Concert of the twenty-third series of the Festival Choral Society took place, on the 18th ult., under the conductorship of Dr. Swinnerton Heap, at the Agricultural Hall, and was opened by a performance of Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture, during the performance of which the choir and audience stood as a mark of respect to the memory of the late Sir Joseph Barnby. Effective renderings were also given of Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" Overtures, the Prelude to Act 3 of "Lohengrin," German's "Gipsy Suite," and the "Danse des Sylphes" and the Hungarian March from Berlioz's "Faust." The vocalists were Madame Fanny Moody and Mr. Charles Manners, whose singing was fully appreciated. The principal violinist was Mr. Fred. Ward, and Mr. F. T. Watkis presided at the organ.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. Frederic Briggs, to St. Martin-at-Palace, Norwich.—Mr. A. Hickman, Organist and Choirmaster to Christ Church, Cradley Heath, Staffordshire.—Mr. George F. Mountford, Organist and Director of Choir to Parish Church, Pontypridd, South Wales.

These exercises will be adapted for use in school and other classes beginning an Autumn course. They will provide not only easy sight singing studies to be done in the class room, but exercises suitable for home study. With blackboard work and an educational method of teaching songs, they will probably suffice for the needs of many school classes, or they will usefully supplement a regular class book.

School songs in both notations, and studies and tests of a more advanced character, will also be given as heretofore in the music section.

LESSONS ON INTERVALS AND THEIR NOMENCLATURE.

The identification and nomenclature of intervals is one of the difficulties of elementary musical theory.

With a view to assist Teachers and Students, a set of plain lessons upon this topic was commenced in the October issue of The School Music Review.

The system of naming recommended by the Education Department, the Royal Academy of Music, Trinity College, &c., will be used.

Copies of the October and November numbers may be obtained of the Publishers.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S

PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed, the work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul have to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively—'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' The style of the composition resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguishes itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City,' and other of the composer's works. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for the author's lyrics; the tunes selected are from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will, undoubtedly, greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

A MEDITATION
ON THE
Sacred Passion of the Holy Redeemer
The Words selected and written by the
REV. W. J. SPARROW-SIMPSON, M.A.
J. STAINER.

This Work is an attempt to supply the want long felt of an easy and short form of Passion Music suitable for use in ordinary Parish Churches. It is composed for two solo voices, a Tenor and a Bass, and for the church choir. At intervals hymns occur, in which the whole congregation can join. The performance will probably not extend over forty minutes in duration, thus giving an opportunity for a suitable "address" if thought advisable. No orchestra is required, the accompaniments being specially adapted for the organ only; much of the expense usually attending Passion Services will therefore be avoided. The book of the words, for distribution among the congregation, contains the music of the Hymns; by this means it is hoped that the congregation will be induced to take part heartily in the service.

Vocal Score, Paper Cover, One Shilling and Sixpence.
Paper Boards, Two Shillings. Tonic Sol-fa, Ninepence.
Words only, with Hymn Tunes, Twopence each.
Words Complete, Ten Shillings per Hundred.

Extract from Preface.

Thirty-three years have elapsed since the publication of the first English edition, and faithful to its original as that edition may have been in the main, it has been felt that closer adherence to the accepted standard text is attainable, and, as far as is at all practicable, should be attained. With this view the present edition is issued. The chorales, choruses, and solos have been newly and independently translated from the original German words, and the adaptation of the narrative of the Evangelist, a task rendered perhaps somewhat less difficult and hazardous by the aid of the Revised Version of the New Testament, has been carefully reconsidered and re-arranged so as to preserve unaltered, as far as may be, the musical text of the original.

THE NEW AMERICAN COPYRIGHT BILL.

By Edward Cutler, Q.C.

It would seem too sanguine to hope for anything approaching to finality in the copyright relations between England and America. The Act of 1891 has only just introduced a more beneficent régime than the stern one which ignored the rights of English authors altogether, and new agitation is already occurring. The draft of the bill which has recently been submitted to the House of Representatives (February 13, 1896) by Mr. Treloar, and which, if passed, will become law on July 1, 1896, would seem, at first reading, to enlarge the rights of foreigners publishing in America; but there is so much of what appears purposely to be shrouded in doubt, that the English publisher or author is induced to exclaim with Laocoon: "I fear the Greeks, though coming with gifts in their hands."

The clause in Mr. Treloar's bill conferring copyright—dramatic and musical—enacts that the author or proprietor of a book, dramatic or musical composition shall, on compliance with prescribed forms, have the sole liberty of printing, publishing, and vending; and, in the case of a dramatic or musical composition, of public performance. Exclusive right of dramatisation and translation is given to authors. The line of cleavage from the present law is traced lower down.

Several changes in matters of detail are proposed, but they all shrink into comparative insignificance beside the burning question of native versus foreigner; according to one view which seems to be taken of the probable operation of the proposed statute, British authors will be saved the trouble of considering the working of its clauses (except as a historical study), as they will be ignored by it.

At present Great Britain fills the condition which, under the Act of 1891, entitles non-Americans to copyright—that is to say, her laws put Americans on the same footing as Britons, quâ copyright. This conclusion has been solemnly arrived at and vouched for by the highest non-judicial authority, and on the faith of it the President has declared Great Britain to be entitled to the benefits of the Act. Let us piously accept the dictum without cavil or question; it has been laid down, has appeared in print, and therefore must be true.

Let us see now whether the qualification as regards nationality for admission to American copyright has been varied by the bill of Mr. Treloar. It reads in effect: "The author or proprietor of any book . . . shall have the sole liberty of printing and publishing." There is no such qualification to the word "author" as in a former enactment (sec. 4952 of the revised statutes), which reads: "Any citizen of the United States or resident therein who shall be the author." "Author," unless intended to be moulded and cut down by necessary implication from subsequent clauses, means "author" without reference to nationality. There is, moreover, no clause (like sec. 13 in the Act of 1891) imposing the condition that an author must be native of a state giving reciprocal benefits to America; "author" would seem to mean any author—American, English, or otherwise—who complies with the provisions as to deposit of copies, &c., in the bill.

There is, no doubt, an argument on sec. 13 of the proposed Act, to the effect that no certificate of registration of copyright shall be issued to a citizen of the United States except on the production of a certain affidavit; and there are the forms of registration (sec. 17) where, in the proposed title, the author is described as "a citizen of the United States of America." Again, after the word "publication" in sec. 12 of the proposed Act, the words "in this or any foreign country" (which occur in the Act of 1891) are omitted. There is also force in the possible argument on sec. 21: "that alterations by foreign authors" in books previously published may in some cases be copyrighted—a clause which might be unnecessary if books of foreign authors generally were admitted; but none of these collateral arguments would seem sufficient to import so crucial a limit as that in question, which, if intended, might easily have been placed beyond a doubt.

The clause in the Act of 1891 (sec. 13) extending copyright to a citizen of a state which confers reciprocal benefits, is in terms made applicable only to that statute, and clause 13 is inconsistent both with that interpretation of the bill which would include and with that which would exclude foreigners, and must be taken to be repealed by the last section repealing all existing inconsistent statutes: the proclamation of the President in favour of Great Britain under the Act of 1891 would fall with this repeal.

On the whole, whatever may have been the intention, the language of the bill, as it stands, admits authors and proprietors, of whatever nationality, to American copyright, provided they comply with the formalities.

Those formalities are not substantially varied and are well known. There is the necessity for delivery of a copy of the title; and in the case of a book, dramatic or musical composition, delivery of two copies printed from type set up in the United States, or from plates made therefrom, or from engraved plates made in the United States, or from transfers therefrom (the words in italics are added in the proposed law).

The condition that musical compositions must be home-printed or engraved will be a variation of the last importance. Let us hope that this variation, together with the not less important one giving exclusive performing right to musical composers, may supply the raison d'être of Mr. Treloar's bill, without our being driven to the theory that the bill is due to an intention to exclude all foreign composers.

While on this part of the subject, it may be noticed that sec. 28 annexes a minimum penalty of 100 dollars for unlawful performance of a "dramatic or operatic composition." No specially defined penalty is annexed to piratical performance of non-operatic music.

In lieu of the present term of twenty-eight years, renewable for another fourteen, the new law contemplates a term of forty years, renewable for twenty.

Importation of piratical matter (now only prohibited) is crystallised into a misdemeanour, and the penalty is extended to musical compositions; and the correlative case of a purchase (according to the literal construction of the language, even where such purchase is innocent) entails a similar stigma (sec. 14 and 15).

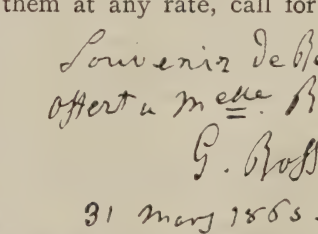
Packages may be inspected (sec. 16) by postal or custom-house officials, and if tainted with piratical matter will meet with the same fate as treasonable or blasphemous papers met at the hands of the common hangman in the days of the Stuarts.

The obtaining a certificate of copyright is made a condition precedent to suing for infringement (sec. 18).

Subsequent editions containing substantial changes may be copyrighted (sec. 21).

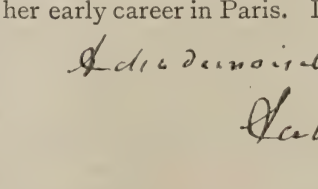
The obtaining a certificate of registration, strangely enough, will entail on the proprietor the duty of delivering copies under a heavy penalty (sec. 22).

By sec. 24 there must be an inscription on some visible portion of every edition, or on the substance on which the same shall be mounted, of a form giving notice of the claim to copyright. This clause deserves credit, as comparing favourably with the analogous ones in a British statute, and in the Berne Convention.



The collision between the words "musical composition" and "book" (which resulted in Messrs. Novello's triumphant action) may still occur in Mr. Treloar's bill, and some ground for a similar confusion is also found in the apparent opposition of "book" in sec. 26 and "dramatic composition" in sec. 27, which imposes a penalty on printing and publishing.

Piratical publishing of a MS. entails the somewhat vague liability of all damages caused to the proprietor by such injury.



As at present, it is sufficient if the deposit of title and copies is made "on or before the day of publication"; so that if the language of the present draft is so to be read that foreigners can comply with the formalities and enjoy copyright, the practice as to these formalities will remain as now. On the whole, it would seem as if the bill was meant to look like one thing, while the propounder relies upon the patriotism of American judges to hold it to be another; if not, why was it not said in plain terms that foreigners are or are not included in its benefits? If he does so rely, and the thing is concealed dynamite, he may find that he has gone a little too far, and end by being hoisted with his own petard.

FROM MY STUDY.

The autographs reproduced in the text of the present article do not, as regards two of them at any rate, call for remark. Those of Rossini and Auber were contributions to a collection made by Marie Roze during the time of her early career in Paris. I am not a student of caligraphy and make no pretensions to discern personal character in handwriting. The gentle reader will, therefore, readily excuse me from occupying any part of his time with valueless speculations, and do so the more readily since the whole book of the lives of these masters has long been open to the public. Some, however, may be sufficiently interested in this matter to compare the autographs, each of which possesses what I believe is called "character."

Dresden 26. Jan. 1844.

Sir

In reply to your favor of the 9th inst. I beg to say that I cannot avail myself of the offers contained in your letter.

I am Sir

Yours respectfully

Jenny Lind Goldschmidt

Jenny Lind

The very terse, decisive, and business-like note in which Jenny Lind puts from her the offer of a London engagement recalls to veteran amateurs the hopes and fears, the growing excitement, and the deepening despair—let the strong word stand—which preceded Benjamin Lumley's success in snaring an artist whom, with some reason, he styled a "shy bird." As far as appears in Lumley's "Reminiscences of the Opera," Alfred Bunn was the first English manager who sought to lure the Nightingale from Germany, where she was singing with enormous success. "Early in the spring of 1845," we read, "this enterprising manager had offered Mdlle. Lind, then at Berlin, an advantageous engagement at his theatre; and the young prima donna had signed with him a contract, which, some months later, she nevertheless declined to fulfil. Learning the secondary position of Mr. Bunn's theatre, she repented her imprudence, protested that she had been taken by surprise, and that she had finally signed in haste in an interval between her appearances on the stage, not knowing all the circumstances of the case; also alleging that she was unable, at so short a notice, to learn the English language sufficiently well to sing in it." I do not intend to discuss the pros and cons of this very old question. It is enough, at such a distance of time, to know that Jenny

Lind asserted the privilege of Woman to change her mind.

In 1846 Lumley saw an opposition house in the very near future and, naturally anxious to hold his own in fight, bethought him of catching the "shy bird." Lumley was a lawyer, and something of a diplomatist, wherefore he did not approach the Nightingale in a manner likely to scare her away. His first measures, indeed, were taken without showing himself at all. The politic and complaisant Meyerbeer was then in Berlin, and readily accepted the task of "sounding" the Swedish artist. But even his influence had little effect. When, at length, Lumley made his proposition, "the young singer," he tells us, "little skilled in the difficulties of stage engagements, and alarmed at the possible embarrassments arising out of her contract with Mr. Bunn, wavered, hesitated, procrastinated, and seemed inclined, after a while, rather to run away from than to approach that formidable London, which appeared to her a quicksand, replete with dangers." However, an engagement was signed, at Darmstadt, on October 17, 1846. Previous to this, efforts at a compromise with Bunn were made, and it must be said that the Drury Lane manager was not unreasonable in his requirements. He offered to release the lady for £500, or for £300 if she would sing one night at his theatre for nothing. "Unfortunately," says Lumley, "the young lady, ignorant, it may be presumed, of the ways of the world, and of her own real position, replied only by a letter addressed to the manager of Drury Lane, in which she appealed to his 'generosity' to grant her an unconditional surrender of her contract, urging that, in an unguarded moment an engagement had been extorted from her of which she now saw the imprudence, and putting it to him as a man of honour and feeling to release her from her bond." This proposition, of course, could not be entertained; the matter remained open to further dispute, and became one of difficulty even to Lumley, whose announcement of Jenny Lind in his prospectus for 1847 was met by the "Covent-Gardenite sharpshooters of the pen" with "allegations, denunciations, and counter-statements, which even Touchstone must have pronounced tantamount to the lie direct."

The terms of Jenny Lind's engagement with Lumley were £4,800 for the season (April 14—August 20); a house free of charge; a carriage-and-pair; a further sum of £800 should the prima donna elect to spend a month in Italy for study or repose prior to her début; liberty to cancel her engagement if dissatisfied with the success gained; and, lastly, payment by Lumley of any damages and costs incurred should Bunn take legal action on her arrival in London. These were severe stipulations fifty years ago, but Lumley thought the Swedish singer was worth them, and the event proved that he was right.

It was one thing to carry Jenny Lind's engagement to London and quite another to lure the young lady herself there. Notwithstanding Lumley's promises to hold her harmless, she still dreaded Bunn, the more, perhaps, from having heard that the Covent Garden opposition had bought that manager's rights and would be likely to use them against the old house in the Haymarket. It may be that steps were taken to work upon the lady's fears, for Lumley writes of her idea that she would be unable to reach Her Majesty's Theatre unless guarded by police. Anyhow, she "lingered on in a state of indecision which to me," says the manager, "was most distressing." Various ambassadors were sent to Vienna, where the timid damsel then was, but without result, and, at last, Lumley went himself, returning with the laurels of a conqueror. Jenny Lind arrived on the morrow (April 16), and made her début in "Robert le Diable," after a little delay, with the extraordinary success which ever since has been a conspicuous matter of musical history. Bunn, with the opposition house behind him, promptly brought his action against the artist, claiming £10,000 damages; but on the day of trial, owing to an insufficient attendance of special jurymen, the hearing was postponed.

This is an old story, but there are always young readers, for whom I have told it again.

In my library is a quarto (sheared, unhappily, by some stupid binder, on whom be anathema), entitled "Cabinetto Armonico, Pieno d'Istromenti sonori, indicate, e spiegati dal Padre Filippo Bonanni, della Compagnìa di Giesù, offerto al Santore David. In Roma. 1722." It contains a large number of engravings showing various characters playing upon antique and, in 1722, modern instruments; but the most curious feature is a formal and, of course, eulogistic dedication to King David, who is addressed as "Santissimo Profeta," and told, with due apologies, that the author takes the liberty of laying the work at the foot of his royal throne. The deceased monarch is naturally the object of complimentary references to his Psalms, from which a quotation is duly made, and the joke (as we should consider it) plays itself out with as much gravity as though Father Bonanni expected an order from Paradise for a thousand copies. A frontispiece shows the King harping upon his harp, while above him, sitting upon a very substantial cloud, a section of the heavenly choir performs upon viol, lute, pipe, and organ, and cherubs sing withal; carrying out the Psalmist's injunction, duly displayed, with pictorial embellishments, on a preceding page: "Laudate eum in sono Tubæ * * * Omnis Spiritus laudet Dominus."

In his introductory chapters, the Jesuit Father makes a great display of authorities, and shows the readiness of an unscientific age to make risky deductions. But better men than he have handled the same subject, and the value of the book really lies in the drawings of instruments by Stefano Sparigioni. Of these there are 148, each example being represented in the hands of an appropriate personage. Some of the machines so displayed are of the most formidable kind, and must have been so appalling in their effect that I marvel they are not imitated for use in the streets of London. There is, for example, a Tubo Cochleato, swung on a tripod like a gipsy's kettle, and, if the curved pipe were straightened, apparently about twenty feet long. Another tremendous engine, said to have been a favourite with Alexander the Great (who may have used it to frighten the Indian elephants), is supported in the same manner. Its form is circular, and a soldier blows into a mouthpiece at the one end of a diameter, the sound issuing at the other through a "bell." I have not looked up the authorities for these and other strange creations, but probably Padre Bonanni is right in representing that they once existed. It seems to me that composers of orchestral music in our own time have missed some opportunities. The Tubo Cochleato would be just the thing for the Worm in "Siegfried."

Looking into Boswell's "Life of Johnson" in search of a reference to another matter, my attention was drawn to an epitaph on Charles Claudius Philips, a violinist obviously of some note in his day. The monument to this worthy is in the porch of Wolverhampton Church, and bears the following inscription: "Near this place lies Charles Claudius Philips, whose absolute contempt of riches, and inimitable performances on the violin, made him the admiration of all who knew him. He was born in Wales, made the tour of Europe, and, after the experience of both kinds of fortune, died in 1732." To the memory of this person Dr. Wilkes dedicated the following lines:

Exalted soul! thy various sounds could please
The love-sick virgin, and the gouty ease;
Could jarring crowds, like old Amphion, move
To beauteous order and harmonious love.
Rest here in peace, till angels bid thee rise,
And meet thy Saviour's consort in the skies.

Garrick told Boswell that Johnson, on reading this stanza, remarked: "I think, Davy, I can make a better," and, after a little meditation, recited as below:

Philips, whose touch harmonious could remove
The pangs of guilty power or hapless love;
Rest here, distressed by poverty no more,
Here find that calm thou gav'st so oft before;
Sleep, undisturbed, within this peaceful shrine,
Till angels wake thee with a note like thine.

Dr. Wilkes, the author of the original epitaph, was a fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, and Rector of Pitchford, Shropshire, for a history of which county he collected materials.

Boswell and his commentators make other references to musical men and things. Croker remarks, for example: "To the delights of music he (Johnson) was equally insensible; neither voice nor instrument, nor the harmony of concordant sounds had power over his affections, or even to engage his attention. Of music in general he has been heard to say: 'It excites in my mind no ideas, and hinders me from contemplating my own'; and of a fine singer or instrumental performer that he 'had the merit of a canary bird.'" Boswell speaks much to the same effect: "After having talked slightingly of music, he (Johnson) was observed to listen very attentively while Miss Thrale played on the harpsichord, and with eagerness he called out, 'Why don't you dash away like Burney?' Dr. Burney upon this said to him: 'I believe, Sir, we shall make a musician of you at last.' Johnson, with candid complacency replied: 'Sir, I shall be glad to have a new sense given me.'"

Again Boswell: "In the evening our gentleman farmer, and two others, entertained themselves and the company with a great number of tunes on the fiddle. Johnson desired to have 'Let ambition fire thy mind' played over again, and appeared to give a patient attention to it; though he owned to me that he was very insensible to the power of music. I told him that it affected me to such a degree as often to agitate my nerves painfully, producing in my mind alternate sensations of pathetic dejection, so that I was ready to shed tears, and of daring resolution, so that I was inclined to rush into the thickest part of the battle. 'Sir,' said he, 'I should never hear it if it made me such a fool.'" Yet the Doctor must often have wished for susceptibility to an art which gave his friends such exquisite pleasure. Burney states that, not six months before his death, Johnson said to him: "Dr. Burney, teach me at least the alphabet of your language."

When on his Scottish tour, a Miss Maclean sang songs to him, accompanying herself on a spinet. "Dr. Johnson," says Boswell, "seemed pleased with the music, though he owns he neither likes it, nor has hardly any perception of it. He told us that he knew a drum from a trumpet, and a bagpipe from a guitar, which was about the extent of his knowledge of music." It seems that Johnson preferred the bagpipe. Boswell says: "We had the music of the bagpipe every day at Armidale, Dunvegan, and Col. Dr. Johnson appeared fond of it, and used often to stand with his ear close to the great drone." No stronger proof could be given of the fact that he had an unmusical nature. Naturally the Doctor spoke slightingly of what was beyond his reach. The pursuit of music he described as "a method of employing the mind without the labour of thinking at all, and with some applause from a man's self."

Truly some precious things are hidden from the wise and prudent and revealed unto babes, which is part of the great system of compensation that keeps the world balanced. X.

Except for two short visits to Weimar in June and August, the greater part of 1849 seems to have been spent in Leipzig. Whilst at Weimar Bülow was constantly in the company of Liszt, and his letters furnish ample and interesting accounts of Liszt's daily life there. This was the terrible year of the revolution, which raged most fiercely in Dresden. Great was his anxiety for the safety of his friend Wagner, of whom he could gain no tidings at the time. In the autumn he removed to Berlin and continued his University studies there. Ever ready with his pen, it was now that his journalistic literary activity manifested itself in earnest, on his being appointed a regular contributor to the Abendpost, a democratic organ of that city. At the same time he zealously pursued his musical studies independently of instructors. Here he remained till August, 1850, when he went to Weimar for the first performance of "Lohengrin" (August 8), a hearing of which proved the determining point in his life, inasmuch as it led him to the final resolution to devote himself to music, and to music alone.

Shortly after this he received a proposition from Wagner that he should spend the following winter with him at Zürich, with the view to his being instructed in the routine of conducting. As a further inducement, Wagner promised that he should share the post of conductor of the Opera, as well as the salary, with his friend Ritter, and that opportunities would be accorded him of appearing as a pianist at the Symphony Concerts which Wagner himself conducted. This was an offer which any young and aspiring musician would have jumped at. Nor did Bülow hesitate, but started off at once to consult his father, who, it should be said, had recently separated from his wife (Bülow's mother) and married another, with whom he was residing at Oetlishausen, an old castle which he had purchased in Switzerland. He met with less opposition from his father than from his mother, who, as a staunch conservative, was violently opposed to Wagner. Most pathetic and dutiful are the letters which Bülow wrote to his mother in exculpation of the step he had taken. Sad it is to read of the consequent estrangement which arose between mother and son, and which it took him a long time to smooth over. As testimonials of his talent and ability, the letters addressed to his parents by Liszt and Wagner are most convincing.

Bülow arrived at Zürich in October, after making the journey thither from Oetlishausen on foot, in the company of his friend Ritter. Wagner at once found plenty for him to do in the way of conducting operas and rehearsals, and correcting the band parts, which were full of mistakes. At first the members of the orchestra were inclined to despise his youth, but, by the help of Wagner, whom they revered, were soon brought to recognise his innate talent as a conductor. This state of things did not last for long, for early in December Wagner severed himself from the theatre, and thus Bülow lost his post. In these two months he gained much experience, and therefore did not regard them as lost time. He was fortunate in at once being offered the conductorship of the theatre at St. Gallen, a post which he readily accepted. Writing to his father at this date, he says: "I shall probably go back to Wagner in the course of the winter, in order that, with his assistance, I may compose an opera. I have an enormous desire to write one on the subject of Christ." Both Liszt and Wagner dissuaded him from so impracticable an attempt. In full activity he remained at St. Gallen till April, 1851, when he paid a visit to Oetlishausen. While there he wrote several affectionate and interesting letters to his mother, with whom he seems now to have been partially, if not entirely reconciled, giving details of his sojourn in St. Gallen, and speaking hopefully of his future. His father writes: "Hans has been with us now for four weeks in order to recruit himself after what was a severe musical campaign at St. Gallen, and which he brought to an honourable termination. The schooling he has had has given him the capacity to conduct any orchestra. He has written a String Quartet, and contemplates a Symphony on Æschylus's 'Orestes,' which, with that end in view, he is now studying in the original."

At the beginning of June, acting on the advice of Wagner, Bülow betook himself to Weimar, with the view of perfecting himself as a virtuoso of the pianoforte under Liszt's guidance. On his way thither he spent six days in Munich, the art treasures of which city greatly excited his interest and admiration. He arrived at Weimar to find that Liszt was away and was not expected to return till the beginning of July. As it turned out, Liszt did not return home for four months, being detained at Eilsen, in Bückeburg, by the serious illness of the Princess Wittgenstein. During these four months Bülow occupied apartments in Liszt's house on the Altenburg, and had a very lonely time. One day was very much like another. It was his habit to rise at 6 a.m., pound the piano, and after breakfast work on till noon, when Raff generally came to him and critically looked over his compositions, and gave him friendly and salutary hints. This quasi-lesson over, they went together to dine at an hotel, where they usually met Joachim. After dinner, if too hot for a walk, he studied Spanish with Joachim, who, though he had looked askance at him in Leipzig, had now become his friend. Four o'clock found him back on the Altenburg, where he worked till eight, and then went into the town for supper, returning about ten o'clock, when he had a final bout at the piano by moonlight, and so to bed. He heard next to no music at this time, for during Liszt's absence music at Weimar was in a state of stagnation. "Liszt," he writes, "does not stand in need of Weimar, but Weimar greatly needs Liszt." With Liszt's return things became far more lively. Besides his lessons with Liszt, practising and composing, writing articles for several musical papers, acting as Liszt's secretary and amanuensis, and "coaching" pupils whom Liszt had no time to attend to, his time was fully taken up. At the weekly chamber concerts which Liszt instituted, he had frequent opportunities of appearing as a pianist in company with Joachim and Cossmann. Occasionally, during this period, he appeared elsewhere in public. The accounts which he gives of this preparation for the career of a pianiste ambulant are full of interest. This went on almost without intermission till January, 1853, when, at Liszt's advice and well furnished with letters of introduction from him, he started for Vienna, with the view of trying his luck there as "a pupil of Liszt's" and as a virtuoso. Alas! the Fates were against him, Liszt's letters of introduction were of no avail, and he was received just as any stranger might be who wished to assert his claims as a virtuoso. No engagements were offered him. Perforce he was obliged to give a Concert on his own account. The receipts which this brought in amounted to twenty-eight florins against a deficit of 105 florins which he had to pay for expenses. Nor was a better result obtained from a second. "My first two Concerts," he writes, "have left me poor in pocket and sick at heart. I am only richer for the bitter life's experience which they furnished. Too late I discovered that in our time it is not sufficient to possess talent, and that it is impossible to turn one's talents into fame and money unless one first has money to disburse." However, he was fortunate in getting some favourable press notices, which led to subsequent engagements; and on going farther afield—viz., to Oedenburg, Pressburg, and Pesth, he met with a veritable triumph. But his success brought him more artistic fame than ready money. Here it may be remarked that his parents seem always to have kept him short of cash, and that it was only under the direst extremities that he could bring himself to apply to them for help, and then in the most delicate manner possible. We find him expressing regret that his father had felt himself obliged to send him money, and at the same time entertaining the hope that he would not be obliged to break into it.

Travelling from Pesth viâ Carlsbad, Dresden (where he played in the theatre Liszt's orchestral version of Weber's Polonaise and a Hungarian Rhapsody) and Leipzig, he made his way to Carlsruhe in order to assist at the music festival held there during the latter part of September. While there he heard of the sudden death of his father—the greatest grief which he had yet experienced. Most filial and pathetic are the letters which this sad event gave rise to. They were mostly written from Oetlishausen, whither he at once went in order to look after his father's affairs. On returning to Carlsruhe he writes that Liszt, who had long been a second father to him, had planned that in the following year he should visit Paris, where, the worst being now behind him, he felt sure that he would best make his way.

His first object now was to save up money enough to pay for his début in Paris—a hope which was not destined to be realised till a much later period.

Attracted by his mother's presence in Dresden, he soon betook himself to that city, where he would find the necessary quiet to enable him to complete some transcriptions of "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin," with which Wagner had entrusted him, and for which the publishers were to pay.

During the winter of 1853 and the spring of 1854 he was touring in North Germany. We hear of him at Berlin, Dresden, Bremen, Hanover, Brunswick, Leipzig, Weimar, and Hamburg. For the summer he returned to Dresden. "Here," says his mother, "Hans works incessantly and seldom speaks a word. He composes the whole day long and is always intellectually absorbed." While there he made acquaintance with a Polish family, a Count and Countess Kamiénski and their three daughters, one of whom was studying in the Dresden Gallery and painted his portrait. The result was that he accepted an engagement to follow them to their country house at Chocieszwice, in Poland, as music-teacher to the daughters. There he wrote some amusing and caustic letters describing the miseries and dulness of life in a country house situated in the midst of a "Polish desert." His duties were every morning to give the girls, who were far from being clever or interesting, three hours' music lessons, and in the evening to generally entertain the family by playing to them. The rest of the day, except at meal times, he had pretty well to himself, his only companion being one Herr Schneider, who was similarly engaged as drawing-master. With him he studied English and acquired from him a passion for billiards. Bored to death as he was at Chocieszwice, he was sorry when the time came for him to leave. That he held out to the end can only be accounted for by the supposition that he was in the receipt of a good emolument or felt that he was economising expenses.

At the beginning of 1855 Bülow was to be found "concertising," with more or less success, in Breslau, Posen, and Dantzig. By April 1 he was back in Berlin, where, as the successor of Kullak, he had accepted the post of principal professor of the pianoforte at Dr. Marx's private Conservatoire. And here perforce we must leave him, for it is at this point that the present collection of letters is brought to a close.

It is understood that these first two volumes of letters and biographical notes will, in due course, be supplemented by a third volume consisting of Bülow's literary contributions to various journals, to be followed, perhaps, by a further instalment of letters. That such a plan, which would furnish the material for a pretty complete account of Bülow's life and artistic career, will be carried out, is as much to be desired as that the present consignment of letters, &c., should be made accessible in an English dress.

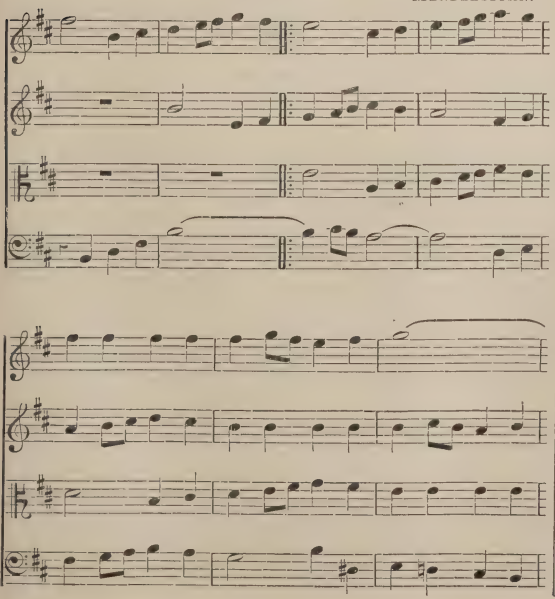
ESSAYS IN MUSICAL CRITICISM.

III.

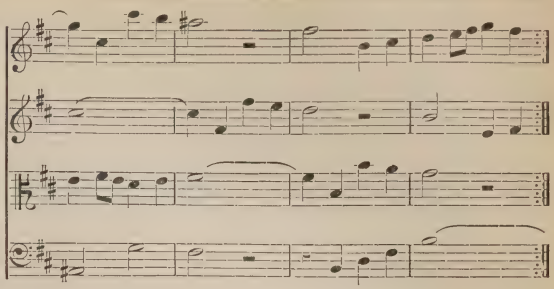
It has been said, and not unjustly, of certain artists, that they regard the great composers solely in the light of stalking-horses for the display of their own virtuosity. This unbridled individualism has of recent years invaded the domain of criticism as well as that of interpretation. Impressionism, up to a certain point, is pardonable and even legitimate in criticism. It is always better to know what a man really thinks of a performance than what he thinks the majority think of it. But this method can be carried to excess, as we propose to illustrate in the following example:

The Irrelevantly Autobiographic.

My enemies are doubtless dying to know what I thought of the performance of Sullivan's "Golden Legend" last week, and I feel that it is a duty which I owe at once to my reputation and my Editor to lose no time in gratifying this highly natural expectation. Let me say at once that I have a decided kindness for Sullivan. Before I embarked on the arduous duties which I now discharge, it frequently fell to my lot as the accompanist of a large provincial Society to organize and direct performances of Sullivan's oratorios and cantatas. On one memorable occasion, which I shall never forget, I was obliged, at the eleventh hour, to transpose all the soprano solos of the "Pirates of Penzance" a semitone down to suit the caprice of a local prima donna at a charity performance of the opera in question. I admit that some of the modulations which I introduced between the numbers might not have satisfied the pedantic academicism of the Royal College—but let that pass. But to revert to the "Golden Legend." On reaching the Imperial Hall last Wednesday, I found that express orders had been left at the box office that I was not to be admitted to any part of the building, in consequence of the well-merited slating of the last Concert which I had published in these columns three weeks ago. Needless to say I was equal to the occasion. I ran round to Snarkson's, the costumier, and in less than twenty minutes, thanks to a false nose and spectacles, I had run the gauntlet and was safely ensconced in the front row of the stalls, consumed with merriment at the success of my strategy. And here let me add, for the edification of my opponents, that I was the only one of the whole gang of critics who sat out the performance. Jinks of the Belgravia Gazette came in at 9 p.m. and went out at 9.40 p.m. Robson of the Morning Mirror sent his "devil," and Messrs. Berkeley Square, Tombs, and Phillimore had all cleared out half-an-hour before the Epilogue, on the "magnificent singing" of which by the chorus I observe that they all commented in their respective papers next morning. During the first half-hour of my penance my attention was seriously distracted by a lady sitting in the second row of the contraltos, who presented a most ridiculous likeness to an old maiden aunt of mine. Now, inasmuch as it is imperatively incumbent upon me to write at least two columns on this fatuous performance, I think my readers will cheerfully admit that this discovery was little short of a godsend. I have no doubt that some of my "respected colleagues" have maiden aunts as well as I; but I am absolutely convinced that none of them could ever have conceived the idea of turning them into "copy." Such an incident marks the gulf that separates the old from the new criticism, the businesslike from the romantic, the coldly practical from the richly irrelevant—in a word, others from me. But to return to my aunt. It is years since I last set eyes on her corkscrew curls and black silk gown—she always wore black silk; but the impression which her meticulous suburban gentility left upon me as a bold, bad schoolboy of fifteen has not been obliterated by all the opulent experiences of my turbid and tempestuous career. I used to spend an occasional Sunday afternoon at her villa down Peckham way, until I shocked the poor lady's Sabbatarian prejudices by playing "Tommy make room for your Uncle" on her paralytic piano, and was forbidden the house for ever. That, I may remark, was the turning-point of my career. The fact of the matter is that in music, as in most other things, we are (or rather until my adoption of the career of musical critic, we were) preposterously over-ridden by the maiden aunt. It was reserved for me to sound the tocsin of revolt against the tyranny of Peckham, and I am sure that any impartial observer, who has not been stifled by the miasmatic influences of Parrycidal pedantry, will testify to the efficacy of my tintinnabulations. But to return to "The Golden Legend." From my seat in the front row I enjoyed an excellent opportunity of watching two of the attendants, whose attitude and demeanour I have always held to constitute an admirable barometer of popular taste. It is the greatest mistake to suppose that attendants hate all music, just as confectioners' assistants get to hate all manner of sweetmeats. Being anxious to put my theories to the test, I once slipped a copy of this journal on to the seat occupied by one of these gentlemen, and had the good fortune later in the evening to overhear his comments on one of my articles to one of his colleagues. "See here, Jim," he said, "what this bloke says of 'The Messiah.' 'Rowdy claptrap,' he calls it. And look what he says of the singers. Calls Mr. Robinson a bloated 'umbug. What beats me is how this sort of chap never gets a thundering good hiding." Admirable attendant! I candidly confess that the same problem has often obtruded itself on my attention. A hundred, nay fifty years ago, my splendid and heroic personalities would in all probability have been resented in a fashion more vigorous than polite. I should in all probability have been pummelled down Pall Mall, kicked round Trafalgar Square, and horsewhipped all along Piccadilly. But the effete and degenerate scions of latter-day respectability have never so much as lifted a finger in protest against my scathing attacks. But to return to "The Golden Legend." I have no doubt that if my maiden aunt had been present she would have been vastly pleased with the puritanical precision of the whole performance. There was the usual clowning on the part of the conductor, the usual perfunctory enthusiasm on that of the audience. Some of the numbers sounded quite passable from the vestibule, where I spent a very pleasant quarter of an hour smoking cigarettes. Let me add, in conclusion, that a severe attack of influenza prevented me from attending Mr. Daniel Desmond's last Recital. I hope, however, to make good my shortcomings by giving a full account of my symptoms and the treatment to which they ultimately yielded in my next article.



The late Sir Joseph Barnby's services to music have been acknowledged with such warmth and unanimity within the past few weeks, by those most qualified to appraise them, that we feel sure the appeal just issued by the Committee of the Barnby



Memorial Trust Fund will meet with a liberal response, not only from music-lovers generally, but also from all to whom the sacred cause of charity is dear. The claims upon Joseph Barnby's purse were many, and he did not live long enough to make adequate provision for his family. It is to remedy this that the Trust Fund has been established. The Committee, of which Sir Arthur Sullivan is Treasurer, and Mr. Alfred Littleton, of 1, Berners Street, Hon. Secretary, consists of over a hundred gentlemen eminent in social, artistic, or literary circles. The Executive consists of the Earl of Kilmorey, the Hon. Spencer Lyttelton, Sir Arthur Sullivan, Sir John Stainer, Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Dr. J. F. Bridge, the Provost of Eton, the Sub-Dean of the Chapels Royal, Colonel Makins, and Messrs. T. H. Brooke-Hitching, W. Coenen, H. Gadsby, H. J. Greenwood, Hermann Klein, J. B. Orgill, A. Randegger, Walter Scott, F. R. Spark, W. H. Thomas, and F. Warre-Cornish. The past and present members of the Royal Albert Hall Choir are also organising a fund to erect a bust of their late conductor in the Albert Hall and assist his children. It is to be hoped the bust will not absorb too large a proportion of the amount subscribed. We may mention that the Trust Fund will be vested in trustees and used solely for the benefit of the three children.

We gladly fulfil our promise to give a solution of the contribution which Mendelssohn made to the late Miss Eliza Wesley's album, and which was printed in the article "Bach and Wesley" in our February number, p. 89. The title, with its significant query, is somewhat after the manner of a picture-puzzle: "Here are the Dean and Verger, find the Minor Canon." The album-leaf is undoubtedly a canon—a minor canon—three in one, with a free bass, though the latter (bars 4 and 5) has a fragment of the subject. The entry of the second part, at a fifth below, is easily discoverable. But the entry of the third part, at the ninth below, or the fifth below the second part, is not quite so obvious; and this was doubtless the point of Mendelssohn's little joke—"Quartet?" Here is the Quartet, note complete, except the note of interrogation:—

QUARTET.

MENDELSSOHN.

Solutions of the canon—a canon which is not unworthy of a place in Dr. Bridge's primer, "Double Counterpoint and Canon"—have been received from Messrs. E. R. Billingham, F. R. Frye, J. L. Gregory, A. W. Ketèlby, W. B. Ross, Arthur Trickett, and H. J. Wrightson.

Mr. Howard Paul, the well known entertainer, has just brought out a little book, entitled "Dinners with Celebrities," in which musicians play no inconsiderable part. When Mr. Howard Paul dined with the late Prince Napoleon ("Plon-Plon"), Rossini was of the party, and the exploits of the "Swan of Pesaro" as a trencherman are most carefully recorded in the following passage: "The spaghetti was the finest I ever remember to have tasted, and small wonder that Rossini enjoyed two helpings. I observed that he ate sparingly up to this course, refusing the tournedos, passing the poulet, and picking lightly the breast of a woodcock. He was evidently reserving his grand coup for the Italian dish, which he demolished with gusto. The old melodist never forgot his early taste, and macaroni, polenta, riviola, spaghetti, and vermicelli were invariably to be found on the table of his villa at Passy." In another chapter we glean the momentous information that Rossini—in his later years, at any rate—rarely ate any breakfast. As for Wagner, he despatched his meals with the velocity of a Flying Dutchman: "I observed that he ate exceedingly fast. It was like posting letters. He placed his food in his mouth, and down it went while he talked. If he had been reared in the United States of America he could not have plied his knife and fork with greater celerity."

The chapter on Sir Arthur Sullivan does not descend into such minute details, but Mr. Howard Paul, on the strength of several dinners in the company of the author of "The Mikado," assures us that there is no man with whom he would rather "unfold the festive napkin." This reticence, however, is fully atoned for in the chapter entitled "Adelina Patti as a Hostess." In this we learn that the diva "is not a great eater, but she keeps a chef who knows his business. She detests great joints, affects dainty French dishes, and her wines are the finest France can produce. I don't suppose she ever tasted sherry or port wine in her life, but in the matter of Sauternes, Clarets, and Burgundies her cellar is unique. Her husband, M. Nicolini, by the way, is something of a cook himself." And then Mr. Howard Paul considerately reproduces the menu prepared for a party of twelve people at Craig-y-Nos, not forgetting the wines and their vintages. Disappointment, however, again awaits us in the chapter headed "A Dinner with Gounod." Still we learn that after dressing in the morning he had a glass of milk, that he breakfasted at twelve, and, though by no means a persistent diner-out, had a "perfect appreciation of right good cheer." On the occasion on which Mr. Howard Paul "unfolded the festive napkin" with Gounod the dinner "was a simple one of half-a-dozen courses." It is to be hoped that Mr. Howard Paul will pursue these gastronomic investigations farther, and give us before long some insight into the culinary tastes of Mascagni, Brahms, Paderewski, and other living lions. An American writer has recently asserted that there is a most intimate connection between food and virtue, food and thought. It remains for Mr. Howard Paul to establish on a secure basis the connection that subsists between music and menus.

A new volume on Richard Wagner has recently appeared at Munich. It is from the pen of Mr. H. S. Chamberlain, whose former work in connection with Wagnerian subjects is likely, on account of its sanity, to be of permanent value to students. In his new volume, which runs to nearly 400 pages, Mr. Chamberlain deals more particularly with the development of Wagner's inner life, and therefore confines his account of outer events to the broadest outlines. His plan of classification and arrangement appears to us so lucid and helpful, however, that we place it before our readers in the author's own words—or, rather, those of a translation which appears in a recent number of The Meister.

Wagner's life begins in the year 1813; it lasts seventy years, and falls into two periods of equal length, but marked external and internal difference. In this life there prevails a singular symmetry, not only in the whole, but also in its parts; for each of these two life-halves may be sub-divided into four minor periods, according to Wagner's place of sojourn—periods of very unequal duration, but impressing themselves on the memory by the fact that each minor period in the second half both parallels and contrasts with the corresponding period in the first half.

In the first half we find the following four periods:—

I. 1813-1833. Life in the narrower Saxon home (Dresden and Leipzig). The period of earliest youth; of attainment of the first elements of artistic skill; of the first attempts on the field of poetry and music; choice of the operatic profession.

II. 1833-1839. First period of Wandering; entry upon public life; activity as Kapellmeister at various German provincial theatres (Würzburg, Magdeburg, Königsberg, Riga); learning of practical stage-technique.

III. 1839-1842. First voluntary stay abroad (Paris); ineffectual attempt to make headway in the world's metropolis.

IV. 1842-1849. Dresden; office as Court-Kapellmeister at one of the principal theatres in Germany.

In the second half we have the following four periods:—

I. 1849-1859. Banished from home; sojourn at Zurich; arrival at full and conscious maturity; production of the fundamental art-writings (Oper und Drama, &c.); farewell to the operatic stage.

II. 1859-1866. Second period of Wandering; activity as producer of his own works at a series of metropolitan theatres (Paris, Vienna, Munich); forced attempt to renew relations with the modern Theatre.

III. 1866-1872. Second voluntary stay abroad (Triebschen, near Lucerne); complete retirement from the world.

IV. 1872-1883. Bayreuth; building of the Festspielhaus, founding of the German Stage-Festivals.

Everyone knows the story of the widow of the firework-maker, who imitated the inscription on Purcell's monument; owing, however, to the difference between her late husband's profession and that of the great musical genius, the words conveyed quite a different meaning. Whether the story be true, we cannot say; yet se non e vero, &c. Its antiquity, however, deserves note. Ernst Ludwig Gerber, in his "Tonkünstler," published at Leipzig in 1792, alludes to it, and also to a mention of it in the first yearly issue of Cramer's "Magazin für Musik," published at Hamburg in 1783; Gerber refers to it as the "funny parody."

In Gerber's dictionary, by the way, the composer's name is entered as Pourcell, with the addition "also Purcell," and he is said to have been born in France about the middle of the seventeenth century. Johann Gottfried Walther, in his "Musikalisches Lexikon" of 1732, quotes Mattheson's statement in his "Critica Musica," Vol. II., p. 148, that Purcell was French by birth; and so far as we can make out, Mattheson was the first to make this assertion. Walther refers to the monument in Westminster Abbey, and to the inscription as "short indeed, but highly flattering."

Mattheson not only says that Purcell was French by birth, but speaks of some opponent who could not accept his statement. "The proofs, however, that this celebrated musician was an Englishman," replies Mattheson, "have come to a dead halt. That he wrote a Te Deum, or Anglice: 'We praise Thee, O God,' and that he has a tomb inscription in Westminster Abbey, does not prove it." You might, he remarks, say: "Handel wrote a Te Deum to English words, therefore he was no native of Halle. Or, Admiral Tordenschild was buried at Hanover, therefore he can have been no Dane." Argumenta, a Schola et a Sepultura desumta, non probant veram Patriam. All this reasoning sounds plausible; yet one little fact to prove Mattheson's statement that Purcell was no Englishman would outweigh it.

With regard to Purcell's compositions, there are one or two curious remarks in the dictionaries mentioned. Walther, for instance, states that in Roger's "Catalogue de Musique" are mentioned: "Six Sonates, trois à une Flûte et Basse Continue, et trois à un Violon et Basse Continue." Again, Gerber speaks of six sonatas, three flute solos, and three violin solos, engraved at Paris. Of Purcell he says that "he is regarded as the founder of the English school, in that he attempted to amalgamate Italian taste, which began to prevail in his day, with the old Celtic Christmas plays and with the Scotch ballads. To Handel only was it possible to cast his fame into the shade."

Jacob Wilhelm Lustig, organist at Gröningen, published a book in 1771, entitled "Inleidung tot de Muziekkunde," in which he remarks how little is known of the celebrated English composers—Butler, Morley, Bacon, Bridlington, and Douland. And then he goes on to speak of a tomb inscription to one Pourcel, French by birth, probably placed there by some affectionate friend. And he gives the inscription in Dutch, and also in English, the latter thus: "Here lyes Henry Pourcel, who is gone to that blessed place where only his harmony can be exceeded. He deed in the jear of our Lord 1696." Mattheson, by the way, with slightly different spelling, also gives this inscription, on which he comments thus: "Here lies [he spells it thus] means Hier lüget, hic mentitur. The word can, it is true, be written with a y, and can then mean to speak untruth and to lie (lügen u. liegen); but with an i, it always means the former." Mattheson gives the inscription to show "how much flattery can be contained in a few words."

A recent and romantic episode, which is reported by a Leipzig paper to have occurred at a small town in the neighbourhood of that city, furnishes important corroborative evidence of the truth of the saying that "ever since the world began There never was and never can Be such a very useful man As the railway porter!" It appears that the station of the town in question boasts the possession of a porter who is not only a vigilant and energetic official, but also an accomplished organist. And when the Cantor of the Lutheran Church happens to be indisposed, the musical porter presides at the organ to the entire satisfaction of the congregation. Now it so fell out that his services were required on Christmas Day, and that after playing a Prelude of Bach's and taking part in the service, he was only waiting for the end of the sermon to play the final voluntary. The preacher, however, was more than usually prolix, and the weary porter, exhausted by his exertions at the station on the previous day, fell sound asleep in the organ loft. At last the sermon ended, and as the porter still slumbered, the clerk came and shook him by the shoulder. Whereon the deputy, who had been evidently dreaming of his duties, woke with a start and exclaimed in stentorian tones: "Express for Leipzig. Platform number two. Take your seats, please!"

The curious effusion with which Mr. George Moore, by permission of the editor of Cosmopolis, has thought fit to commemorate Lord Leighton, who, to the writer's thinking, committed the two unpardonable sins of being President of the Royal Academy and of living in a beautiful house, does not call for serious criticism here or anywhere else; but one passage is so redolent of the new musical criticism in its most fatuous guise that reference to it may not be out of place. In the course of some remarks upon the "Daphnephoria" this sapient art critic delivers himself thus: "A very slight knowledge of singing should have told him [the painter] that the mouth is opened according to the note and the octave." He then proceeds to contrast Leighton's picture with one in the National Gallery in which "each singer is clearly singing a different note"—in "some delicious contrapuntal fancy." Granting Mr. Moore's strange theories of voice-production, does he really mean to carry back counterpoint to ancient Greece? Perhaps he will stop short of assigning its invention to the sculptor whom he elects to write of as "Phideas."

The excellent and practical leading article which appeared in the Standard on the 3rd ult., calling attention to the necessity of official recognition of a standard of musical pitch in this country, is a satisfactory proof, if such were needed, of the widespread interest and importance now attached to the progress of musical art in England. The truth of the writer's remarks received distinct but decidedly unpleasant confirmation at the Philharmonic Concert on the 19th ult., when, some of the orchestra being provided with instruments differing in pitch from those of their fellow executants, and the pianoforte having a pitch of its own, effects undreamt of by the writers of the music performed were produced in generous profusion. The present state of the matter may, however, be regarded as a necessary phase in the development of all English progress. But for the sake of our ears it were well to hasten that progress as much as possible.

Dvořák's "Spectre's Bride" was performed in Vienna, for the first time, on the 25th ult., under the direction of the composer.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

An A.R.C.O. writes: "In passing through a provincial town in Berkshire, I noticed a piece of black wood affixed to the front door of a house and 'W——, Pianofortist,' painted thereon in white letters. Supposing this gentleman wishes to rank in the musical profession, what is the word Pianofortist intended to convey?" I can only guess that pianofortist is pianist "writ large." But it is not a lovely word.

At least one American musical journal has been scolding the New York public for not supporting opera as they should. Everything, artists and works alike, seems to have been regarded with indifference. Listen a moment to the scolder: "It would be a grateful and interesting discovery to meet the prophet who could justly announce what it really is that the New York people want in the way of music, particularly opera, or whether they actually want any at all or not. We have a rebellious, clamouring, exacting public, which demands the very best the music-market offers, which grumbles eternally if novelties are not forthcoming, but which, when it gets them, turns its back upon them with an unwavering exactitude." I cannot say from personal observation whether the New York public do this or whether the press makes them seem to do it, but the probability is that they have opera no nearer their hearts than the kindred people of London, and, like them, act towards it under transient impulses. It seems that the German operas failed along with the French and Italian. But hope remains. The hot fit will surely come round again by-and-by.

The Manchester Guardian of the 14th ult. contained some perfectly just and well-considered remarks upon Mr. Cowen, with regard to his recent appointment. It is a pleasure to reproduce them:—

> It should be remembered that the particular combination of qualities which go to make a successful chef d'orchestre are extremely rare and difficult to secure. There have been, and are, composers of actual genius who fail to arrive at that sort of understanding with the members of an orchestra which is the first necessity with a view to securing a satisfactory performance. This kind of tact in dealing with an orchestra and chorus, which cannot possibly exist except upon a basis of sound and adequate technical knowledge, Mr. Cowen unquestionably possesses, and in some cases at any rate he has shown himself capable of winning the enthusiastic sympathy of the public as well. We do not think that indiscriminate adulation is an advisable line to take in reference to any mortal, nor do we pay Mr. Cowen the very poor compliment of assuming that such adulation is acceptable to him; but we are glad to recognise the well-attested merits of the new conductor, and among these merits the specific quality of a tactful and thoroughly competent orchestral chief.

An Edinburgh correspondent reminds me that George Eliot describes Mrs. Poyser as, under certain circumstances, "falling at once from the key of B with five sharps to the frank and genial C." He rightly observes that we must see at once what the authoress means, though she herself did not know how to express it in a musical figure, and adds: "If so accomplished a musical amateur as George Eliot fails to state so simple a fact accurately, little wonder that the shoals of weekly novels contain the most egregious figures of speech and similes suggested by their authors' untrained sympathies with the art of music." It is no wonder at all.

A small window in a chapel on the South side of the Lady Chapel, Gloucester Cathedral, has been filled with stained glass in memory of Dr. S. S. Wesley, sometime organist. The figures of King David, St. Ambrose, and St. Cecilia are conspicuous in the design, as also a scroll bearing the words and music of the well-known passage, "And sorrow and sighing shall flee away," from "The Wilderness." The money for the window was subscribed locally.

It will not be long before Goldmark's new opera, "The Cricket on the Hearth," will find its way to this country. In any case that would come to pass, for obvious reasons; but as the work was a brilliant success at its first performance in Vienna, on the 21st ult., assurance is now doubly sure. It appears that Messrs. Frank Burnand, Greenbank, and Solomon were working upon an opera on the same subject when the death of Solomon put an end to the design.

There are some funny expressions in a Kentish paper re a Concert given within its district. Readers are told that the programme "would have borne a little more variation, the same faces appearing so often." Mr. S. was one of these too frequent faces, and, in fact, "was booked too much to be admired; nevertheless, his parts were full of feeling and were appreciated." It is also stated that a violinist did well, "the effect of precise playing being a genial appreciation." Concerning a pianist, the critic says, rather unkindly, that his solos "would certainly have made a better interlude than take up a portion of the programme." A comedy was played, and some of the characters "suited the audience admirably, who were kept interested the whole way through a tedious courtship and a final completion. Mr. B. was a splendid get-up, the comicality and drollness of the piece coming from this excellent gentleman, who was self-interested in the abolition of this courtship to suit his personal objects, but who maintained throughout a pretence of disinterestedness." This closed the evening. "'Good things should come last,' as the schoolboy is learnt," says the Kentish scribe, who evidently has not been "learnt" grammar.

A certain paper issued in North Britain is conspicuous for the originality of its musical criticisms. Speaking of a Concert of chamber music this journal mentioned a young lady's performance of two songs by Brahms, adding that she revealed "the affecting pathos of both by a voice of rather exceptional power, ranging to the lower registers, and at the same time capable of several high soprano notes." Warming to his work, the critic goes on to say, "A very interesting feature was the ballad, 'Allerseelen,' sung in the original language by Miss Smith, who cleverly conveyed the meaning of the song (obscured by the language) by her correct interpretation of its murmuring pathos and prolonged tremulos." He finishes with an assurance that "the successful combination of effects and superb tone of the pianoforte solos and accompaniments derived some perfection from the So-and-so grand, which had been kindly," &c.

The movement in favour of a Feis, or Festival of Irish music, seems to be progressing, and there now appears little doubt that the affair will come off. "The programme of the Feis will include: 1. A concert of ancient Irish music, the chief feature of which will be the presentation of a representative selection of the traditional music of Ireland; 2. An orchestral concert of music by modern Irish composers; 3. Choir and band contests; 4. The performance of prize compositions; and 5. Lectures on Irish music." Good! We can all wish well to nationalism in music.

A Kentish paper, noticing a Concert the other day, described the movements in Mozart's Symphony (No. 5) as "Allecon Spirits," "Andante," and "Presto." "Allecon Spirits" is good, very good, and the printer's boy again triumphs.

The harp has an admirer Newark way. He is a musical critic and writes enthusiastically:

Miss Chatterton, solo harpist, selected "Carnival of Venice," an original composition, with which to treat her audience. The dulcet melodies poured forth from the strings followed each other in rhythmic sequence—now like the distant echoes, now fortissimo and full, now dying away in delicious cadences. The consummate skill with which the bizarre effects were produced stamped the soloist as of high rank. A very unmistakable encore followed, and this elicited a delightful treatment of the ever popular "Auld Lang Syne." The verse part was brought out now full and strong and then diminuendo, and finally the solo was furnished a rippling and subdued accompaniment most delightful to listen to.

A correspondent writes:—

I think I must pass on to you the following bit of fun I had out of my young choristers yesterday. We were taking the Benedicite at practice to one of the settings so familiar to most choirs, but unknown here, as this Canticle has not until now found favour at the Cathedral. I tried to improve the occasion by asking whose song this was, a song of deliverance from the fiery furnace. One lad told me it was the "Song of the three Children." "And who were they?" There was a pause of general dubiousness. Presently one or two countenances brightened up a bit: these had been looking over their copies, and had found there the names of the three Children—"Stainer, Winn, and Walker"!

The Kent musical reporters have been distinguishing themselves lately. A correspondent has forwarded yet another example of the way in which they apply the English language to the divine art. This time the scene is not far from London, and I know enough of the Society concerned to understand some of the enthusiasm expressed by the writer. But there was no need for him to say that justice could hardly be done to the performance and "keep within the bounds of sober praise," since he assuredly did not essay the task. On the contrary, he went off like this: "Certainly there was no one of the large audience present, listening to the deliciously presented compositions, but what drank in with a deep pleasure the superb music." The writer was enchanted with the perfect understanding between conductor and orchestra: "Never ahead, the response to Mr. ——'s direction and lead was instantaneous, with the result that one interpretation of the music permeated the whole of the forces under his control." But in this world nothing is perfect, and a single flaw showed that the executants were but fallible mortals after all. The flaw is wonderfully described as "an indifferently synchronised release," which, I suppose, means that, to use the language of ordinary folk, the performers did not stop all at once. Happily, "it could be imagined it had its subsequent beneficent effect, as a slight slip sometimes will." This, I am unfeignedly glad to learn, because "an indifferently synchronised release" sounds very terrible.

Surely it cannot be true that Manchester folk at one time favoured the idea of honouring the late Sir Charles Hallé with an equestrian statue. This would have reached the climax of the ridiculous. Sir Charles knew how to ride the high horse on occasion, but his face would have been a study had anybody suggested to him during life such a post-mortem distinction.

The hundredth Recital of sacred music in Gloucester Cathedral took place on the 19th ult., and was attended by 3,500 people. To mark the occasion the Gloucester Choral Society, assisted by Miss B. Gough, Miss Jessie King, Master Underwood, Mr. C. Morgan, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint performed a selection from "The Messiah." All the solo vocalists distinguished themselves, as did Mr. Chapman, a trumpet player from Cheltenham, and Mr. Capener, deputy-organist, to whom the accompaniments were entrusted. Dean Spence delivered an interesting address in the course of the service, expressing himself very enthusiastically in favour of the Recitals, which, beyond question, have been and are a brilliant success. Mr. C. Lee Williams conducted with his usual skill and judgment.

An American lady has kindly laid out for us the "poetic basis" of Paderewski's Polish Fantasia. Here is her beginning, and, perhaps, that will suffice:

It is one of those still, hot, dry, sultry days, when everything is burning up, grass yellow, flowers wilted, your breath comes in laboured gasps, your lips parched, your throat so dry that it seems to crackle, out of doors hardly a breath is stirring; it is noon of day, but so hot it is that you cannot hear the leaves move—so hot that the butterflies have not the courage to look for flowers. After a little while you notice a cloud coming up; it is getting that peculiar feeling just before a thunderstorm. A damp stillness is in the air. Suddenly a low rumble of distant thunder is heard. It gets louder, then sinks away, and for a few minutes it becomes close and hot again, and you think that your promised rain was all an illusion. But no; after a little while it re-commences again; it is a little louder than before, but very little, and the heat is such that you think you cannot stand it.

So on and on through a thunderstorm, and a revival of damp but satisfied Nature. "Now, one soft, sad farewell, and all is over." How well most of us know the style in which such things are done!

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Berlioz's "Faust" is now regarded quite as a classical work in this country, and a performance is looked for annually, as a matter of course, by the patrons of the Royal Choral Society at the Albert Hall. The French composer's secular masterpiece in this department of art was duly rendered on Thursday, the 12th ult., and attracted a very large audience. The not very grateful titular part received full justice from Mr. Ben Davies, and Miss Ella Russell, though rather cold and unimpassioned, sang extremely well as Marguerite. Mr. Douglas Powell was a capital Brander and, of course, Mr. Henschel, who has been irreverently termed the "prince of concert-room devils," was perfect as the cynical and grimly humorous Mephistopheles. Making allowance for one or two slight errors, which were due rather to over-zealousness than want of knowledge, the choir sang with its wonted effect and the orchestra was excellent under Sir Alexander Mackenzie.

The postponed performance of "Judas Maccabæus" took place on the following Wednesday, the 18th ult. There were some changes in the list of principal artists as originally announced, but Handel's military oratorio did not suffer in consequence. Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Maggie Purvis, Miss Florence Oliver, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. S. Masters were by no means ineffective, and Mr. Santley sang the two principal bass solos magnificently. Again the chorus did remarkably well throughout, and although many numbers were omitted we have heard few more impressive interpretations of "Judas Maccabæus."

THE BACH CHOIR.

The production by the Bach Choir, on February 25, at the Queen's Hall, of a "Requiem" by Mr. Alfred Bruneau, will remain one of the most memorable events of this season. That a French work of such important design should be first produced in London is in itself a striking testimony of the esteem in which English amateurs are held by Continental composers, and also reflects much credit on the enterprise of the Bach Choir. In criticising music based on religious ideas the predisposition of the composer's nation should always be kept in view. The French people are essentially theatrical. The glare of the footlights exercises a peculiar fascination over the mind of the Gallic art-worker; to him it throws the most effective lights and shades upon his productions, and he consequently designs them for this atmosphere. Theatrical effects were therefore to be expected in Mr. Bruneau's setting of the Roman Catholic service for the dead, and they are certainly to be found in the score. Now the tendency of theatrical realism in music is to be graphic rather than suggestive. This is strikingly shown in the opening of the setting of the "Dies Iræ," in which the composer, by the most ear-splitting clashings of the full power of the orchestra, has sought to conjure up in the mind's eye a vivid scene of wild confusion and frenzied anguish which shall excite feelings of terror, after the fashion of stage thunder. It is in these endeavours at pictorial illustration that Mr. Bruneau has gone astray, not because he lacks originality or craftsmanship, but because he has sought to express that which is outside the possibilities of his art. Music can suggest the presence of an awful and stupendous power, but when it attempts to portray the effect graphically, it becomes ludicrous. It is curious to notice how instantly Dame Cecilia gathers up her skirts and vanishes when her limitations are ignored. The occasions on which she does so in Mr. Bruneau's "Requiem" must be regarded as but the blemishes on what otherwise is a work of remarkable originality, intense expression, and masterly workmanship. The portions which appeal most to the musician are the "Quid sum miser," with its ear-haunting melody; the clever and effective use made of counterpoint in the "Recordare," set as a duet for soprano and contralto; the genuinely fine music contained in the Sanctus; and the melodic beauty and delicate scoring of the "Agnus Dei." The effective use of the plain-song theme associated with the "Dies Iræ," and many passages, both in the vocal and orchestral writing, excite the respect and esteem of musicians. Considering the many difficulties of the work, the performance, under the direction of Professor Villiers Stanford, was very praiseworthy. The solo parts, with the exception of the passage in the "Hostias," assigned to a boy, were efficiently sung by Madame Amy Sherwin, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Robert Hilton. The "Requiem" was preceded by an effective rendering of Brahms's "Tragic" Overture and followed by Beethoven's "Mount of Olives."

The performance of Bach's "Passion Music" according to St. John, on the 24th ult., at the Queen's Hall, must be placed amongst the most successful achievements of the Bach Choir. The use of the original German text was not wholly a gain, having regard to the way in which the work now appeals to the religious feelings of English audiences and the pronunciation of the choir, but the fervent earnestness of the music was finely expressed. The audience, which was a large one, abstained from applause in obedience to a printed request, and so impressive indeed was the rendering that it may be said to have largely partaken of the nature of a religious function. Mr. Cornelius Bakkes, whom it was deemed necessary to fetch from the Continent for this occasion, sang intelligently; but his tenor voice is too light in quality to fulfil the requirements of English audiences in this music. Mr. David Bispham declaimed the words of Christ with unsurpassable dignity and impressiveness, the effect of his utterances being intensified by the organ instead of the pianoforte being used in the recitations relating to the Saviour. The other soloists were Miss Fillunger, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Andrew Black, of whom it is unnecessary to speak. Mr. H. R. Bird presided at the organ, Mr. F. A. Sewell at the pianoforte, and Professor Villiers Stanford conducted.

LONDON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mr. Henschel brought his tenth season to a brilliant close, on the 19th ult., with the Choral Symphony, and deserves to be heartily congratulated on the educational value of the scheme which has made the ten Concerts so interesting. It has included performances of all Beethoven's Symphonies, nine of his eleven Overtures, his three finest Pianoforte Concertos, and that for violin, the Choral Fantasia, the Great Mass in D, and some half-a-dozen of the master's best vocal pieces. These have been played in chronological order, so that an exceptional opportunity has been afforded to the more intelligent class of music-lovers of studying the gradual development of Beethoven's style. The eighth Concert included, besides the "little" Symphony in F, the "King Stephen" Overture, and a repetition of the Choral Fantasia, Mr. Henschel's own "Stabat Mater," produced at Birmingham in 1894, and so fully discussed in The Musical Times for October and November of that year that we need not again describe its many excellent qualities, which, on this occasion, were set forth by Mrs. Henschel, Madame Clara Poole, Mr. Hirwen Jones, Mr. Arthur Walenn, and Mr. Henschel's choir and orchestra with admirable results. The programme of the last Concert, on the 19th ult., consisted exclusively of works by Beethoven—namely, the "Dedication of the House" Overture (Op. 124), the song "An die Hoffnung" (vocalist, Miss M. Boye), the "Emperor" Concerto (solo, Mr. Borwick), and the Choral Symphony, of which an excellent rendering was given, the soloists in the vocal portion being Miss Evangeline Florence, Miss E. de Dreux, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Daniel Price. At the close of the Concert, which was very well attended, Mr. Henschel came in for an ovation that everyone present must have felt he had thoroughly earned. The London Symphony Concerts will inaugurate their eleventh season on November 12.

QUEEN'S HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The choir with which Mr. Randegger takes such pains was thoroughly at ease at Queen's Hall, on February 26, in Sullivan's "The Golden Legend," but the familiarity it evinced with this beautiful work was not of the kind resulting in carelessness or indifference. It sang throughout with earnestness, vigour, and the closest regard to expression, the latter quality being particularly observable in the hymn "O gladsome light," which has rarely been more effectively rendered. Mr. Edward Lloyd repeated with undiminished charm his reading of the music of Prince Henry, and boldly defined character as well as vocal power marked the mocking fiend of Mr. Watkin Mills. Miss Thudichum was an intelligent representative of Elsie, Mrs. Katharine Fisk sang sympathetically as the Mother, and Mr. F. B. Ranalow was the Forester. The band contributed its share to the general success of the performance, and Mr. H. J. Wood was at the organ.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

Rossini's birthday was duly commemorated, at the Concert of the 1st ult., by performances of his Overture to "William Tell" and the Romance and Prayer from his "Otello." The former was effectively played, but Mrs. Henschel's style hardly lends itself to the histrionic exigencies of the latter. The Symphony was Brahms's No. 3, of which the rendering given was in places scarcely worthy of the reputation of the band or its conductor. Herr Stavenhagen was heard to advantage in Beethoven's C minor Concerto, and Mr. Henschel, besides joining his wife in the engaging duet from Boieldieu's "Les Voitures Versées," gave the fine scena "Saul's Dream," from Dr. Hubert Parry's oratorio, with much effect, though the orchestral accompaniment was by no means perfectly played.

Haydn's "Creation" was given at the Concert of the 7th ult., and attracted a good audience. The performance was thoroughly efficient throughout, the soprano solos being given with her wonted earnestness of manner and purity of style by Miss Anna Williams, who was much applauded for her rendering of "With verdure clad" and "On mighty pens," while Mr. Andrew Black was as vigorous and incisive as ever in the bass numbers. In the tenor music Mr. Herbert Grover, who made his début at these Concerts, sang carefully and with good intention. The choir exerted itself with very satisfactory results, and the whole performance was conducted with spirit and intelligence by Mr. Manns.

At the Concert of the 14th ult. Mr. Manns paid his annual tribute to the genius of Schubert by a splendid performance of the great C major Symphony, in which the delicacy of the trombones and the fine playing of the wood-wind quartet call for especial eulogy. Dr. Joachim was the instrumental soloist, choosing for his principal contribution Viotti's genial Concerto in A minor, which he gave in his very best style. Later on he aroused great enthusiasm by his dignified and poetic rendering of Bruch's familiar Romance, adding a familiar unaccompanied Bourrée by Bach as an encore. Mr. Jack Robertson sang Handel's "Where'er you walk" ("Semele") and Dvorák's "Songs my mother taught me" gracefully, though somewhat mawkishly. He was much more convincing in a tuneful but obvious version of "O my love's like a red, red rose," by Löhr, which a certain section of the audience insisted on encoring. Grieg's picturesque but décousu "Autumn" Overture completed the programme.

On Saturday, the 21st ult., Mr. Manns had provided a sensational surprise for his patrons in the shape of a work by Richard Strauss, entitled "Til Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche," which, in a little speech addressed to the audience at the conclusion of the work, Mr. Manns declared to be the most difficult work he had ever undertaken to produce. "Til Eulenspiegel," better known to English readers as "Tyll Owlglass," is the hero of a mediæval German romance, if the term hero can be applied to one who was about equally compounded of knavery and folly. To English readers there is something portentously heavy about his jests, and Herr Strauss's musical treatment is quite to match, the orchestra employed being of momentous magnitude. For not only are the strings divided, but the band includes a piccolo, three flutes, three oboes, an English horn, a D clarinet, two B flat clarinets, a bass clarinet, three bassoons, a double bassoon, eight horns, six trumpets, three trombones, a bass tuba, and various percussive trimmings. The results are hardly proportionate to the means employed, but the piece is prodigiously clever in its way, and should be heard again. The programme also included Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony, finely played, and Miss Rosalind Ellicott's amiable Concertstück for pianoforte and orchestra, in which the solo was gracefully played by Miss Sybil Palliser. Miss Ella Russell's choice of songs cannot be commended on the score of novelty, but she sang them carefully and effectively. The Concert closed with Berlioz's Overture to Byron's "Corsair."

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

Two Concerts have been given out of the seven announced by this Society for its eighty-fourth season, and at each an important novelty was produced. At the first Concert (February 27) interest and curiosity gathered round a Symphony by the Russian composer, Alexander Borodine, in whose name only two such works stand. This may appear as scanty achievement; we must remember, however, that Borodine was not a professional musician, but a professor of medicine and chemistry in St.

Petersburg, and could only give his spare time to the art he followed with, under the circumstances, singular devotion. The Symphony now referred to is in B minor, contains the usual number of movements, and is written throughout in classic form. With these features all resemblance to the music of Western Europe may be said to end. The themes and rhythms are distinctly Sclavonic—some of them no less distinctly Oriental—and to the same source may be traced conspicuous points in their treatment, such as persistent repetition of short phrases, alternations of languor and wild exuberance, and harmonic progressions which certainly stand not upon the order of their going.

The four movements of the Symphony are distinguished by sufficient variety, while bearing the same stamp of origin. In the opening Allegro we have a movement fairly compact and logically wrought out, sometimes with much grace and quietness, sometimes with equal energy and noise.

The Scherzo, opening with a most distressful dissonance, is full of clever device and appropriate animation, relieved by a quaintly melodious Trio; the Andante, while hardly less characteristic than the other movements, contains much that Western ears can recognise as beautiful, and the Finale, in which a whole battery of percussion takes part, carries us to Asia in the frankest and most open manner. It is an example of rampant Orientalism, and the audience listened in some wonder, and considerable doubt what to make of it all. But we are glad to have heard the Symphony. It indicates that which, according to present appearances, will be, in some more or less modified form, the "music of the future." Not the Philistines, but the Slavs are upon us.

At the same Concert Sullivan's Overture "In Memoriam" was performed as a pièce d'occasion, Mr. John Dunn gave a generally good account of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, and Mr. Sapellnikoff played Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor. The vocalist was Miss Esther Palliser, who sang the Cradle Song from Mackenzie's "Bethlehem." Sir A. C. Mackenzie, who was heartily received, conducted with customary good judgment and effect.

There were actually two novelties at the second Concert (19th ult.), though only one of first-class importance. We refer to a Concerto in B minor for violoncello (Mr. Leo Stern) and orchestra, from the pen of Antonin Dvorák, who, having very recently composed it, visited England for the purpose of presiding at its introduction to public notice. We are by no means sure that, as a Violoncello Concerto, this work will become a favourite, and it had better be regarded, perhaps, as three orchestral movements with violoncello obbligato. Concertos for Mr. Stern's instrument should be written, if possible, by the performers, who would take good care to make the soli effective and see the orchestra kept back in its place. Not being a virtuoso, and not bearing sufficiently in mind the fact that the violoncello does not "carry" well, Dvorák has written soli which are a good deal covered up, as well as eclipsed in interest by the orchestral music. This is less obvious in the slow movement—the gem of the work—where the violoncello finds an opportunity to be heard at its best, with exceedingly good results. Even here, however, the middle episode shows the orchestra standing well in front of the solo. Taken without reference to the considerations just touched upon, the work is one of much interest and quite characteristic of the source whence it has come to us. Mr. Stern discharged an arduous task with success which was as conspicuous as circumstances allowed. The second novelty was a set of five Biblical Songs, also from the pen of Dvorák, and now published for voice and pianoforte (their original form) by Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. These pieces, which seek to enforce the sentiments of the text without regard to musical form, were scored for the Philharmonic orchestra by the composer, and sung with much taste and judgment by Mrs. Katharine Fisk. We doubt the wisdom of orchestrating the accompaniments, admirably as that was done. What is conceived for the pianoforte rarely lends itself graciously to adaptation for other instruments, and in this case the orchestral voices seemed to lessen the intensely personal expression which marks the songs in their original form. The prevalent feeling of the series is one of gloom, but No. 4, "The Lord is my Shepherd," came as a delightful contrast, and the cheerfulness of No. 5 was hardly less grateful. Dr. Dvorák conducted both novelties and also his beautiful Symphony in G. We can only mention that Mr. Sauer played Beethoven's E flat Concerto, but the performance, as a whole, was not the best conceivable, owing mainly to the difference of pitch between the orchestra and the solo instrument.

SAVOY THEATRE.

Mr. W. S. Gilbert must be conscious that his enforced bondage to a method has at least one advantage. We say enforced bondage because the public have shown ere now that they resent any effort on his part to abandon topsy-turveydom—to deal with events and circumstances as with pyramids standing on their base and not their apex. The structure of a Gilbert libretto must always rest upon its apex, and the advantage to which we have referred lies in an opportunity of showing that the dramatist's skill and resourcefulness are equal to any demands. Mr. Gilbert has applied his topsy-turvey method in a dozen different directions, with nearly uniform success; in "The Grand Duke" (produced on the 7th ult.) we see him exercising a familiar art upon still fresh matter amid peals of approving laughter. In most of his works it is easy to detect a deeper purpose than that of exciting mirth by verbal dexterity and quaint conceits. Mr. Gilbert is a satirist, and in his latest piece he proclaims that real Courts and sham Courts—the histrionic appliances of the palace and of the theatre—are pretty much alike and even interchangeable. All things, in fact, are reduced to mere "play-acting," and the exalted personage with most opportunities is merely the "star" of a company. Mr. Gilbert delights to poke fun at the supers and walking gentlemen on the boards of the Royal Court Theatre he sees so clearly, and here gives his legitimate Grand Duke a train of seven chamberlains.

The Grand Duke communicates only with the Lord Chamberlain, and a request for snuff-box or handkerchief descends through all the seven grades of flunkeydom, the thing asked for, supplied by the lowest official, passing upward with like ceremony. Again, when the Prince of Monte Carlo comes on a visit to the Grand Duke he brings a "job lot of second-hand nobles" hired of an agent, costumes and all, at eighteenpence a day each. These personages, who strongly suggest Richardson's Show, are inspected by the Prince, and also harangued: "Now, once for all, you Peers—when His Highness arrives, don't stand like sticks, but appear to take an intelligent and sympathetic interest in what is going on. You needn't say anything, but let your gestures be in accordance with the spirit of the conversation." The gestures are then practised. All this is fair fun, but, of course, the same weapon might be directed against anything that in life is picturesque and otherwise useful. Mr. Gilbert gets the true Prince off the throne and substitutes a player by a process quite characteristic of his humour. He invents an amazing statutory duel and then contrives that the reigning Duke should encounter a son of Thespis, lose the fight, and be superseded.

Upon the groundwork thus laid down the author runs amok of imagination. Wild extravagances, odd conceits, strange characters, stranger circumstances are mixed up in the most fantastic way, and one must laugh with the rest, however disposed to be critical. We cannot here tell the story or discuss the incidents and situations, but it should be said that the last act, as often the case in Mr. Gilbert's pieces, is dramatically weak and unduly spun out. We understand, however, that the book has undergone revision since the first performance, and it would now be unsafe to point out specific faults.

The position of Sir Arthur Sullivan in relation to these Savoy operas is even more difficult than that of his colleague. Mr. Gilbert has a boundless field in which to gather materials for treatment of a nature not unlimited, but the composer is restricted all round. He has to write for singers who cannot "go anywhere and do anything"; his orchestration must be chiefly in the nature of simple accompaniment, and the contour of his pieces, their rhythms, &c., are all restricted. The wonder, therefore, is that the music of any one opera does not more closely resemble that of any other than is actually the case. Happily, Sir Arthur Sullivan has a keen sense of humour and a deft way of expressing it withal. This is an important advantage, humour being a salt of powerful savour, able to make appetising that which, without it, might be somewhat insipid. The gain from humour in the present case is very considerable, and appears at a score of points in the work. For example, in the solo with chorus, "By the mystic regulation," the music, for all its lilting rhythm, is as droll as the direction, Allegro marziale e misterioso. Of a different character is a quintet, "Strange the views some people hold." A light accompaniment attends this, and there are other modifications of the regulation madrigal. But it is none the less a charming piece on that account—one which the composer, showing signs of haste elsewhere, has treated quite carefully. The two numbers mentioned above may stand each for a numerous class, regarding the other bulk of which particulars are scarcely needed. It would be easy, of course, to write at length upon the musicianship which knows how to be simple and amusing without a touch of vulgarity, but that is a merit long since recognised in the Savoy operas. The great point for a public wishing to be entertained by comic opera is that here they have the best thing going of the kind, and, especially, music so adapted to text and situation that its fitness seems to be intuitive; so light and pretty, yet so varied, that the ear cannot weary, and bearing on every page the impress—which many feel who cannot intellectually perceive—of high artistic gifts so used to a modest end as not to be degraded. The work, splendidly mounted and carefully performed, owes much to the leading artists—Mesdames Ilka von Palmay, Emmie Owen, Rosina Brandram, and Florence Perry; Messrs. Walter Passmore, C. Kenningham, Rutland Barrington, Scott Russell, and Scott Fishe.

"SHAMUS O'BRIEN."

In England, the production of a comic opera—or rather an opéra comique, which is by no means the same thing—by a native composer of the first rank, is an event of which the rarity alone, quite apart from results, would give it distinction; but in the case of Professor Villiers Stanford's "Shamus O'Brien," brought out at the Opera Comique Theatre on the 2nd ult., so great a success has been achieved that the occasion is not unlikely to become historically memorable, and may even prove to have inaugurated in these isles a native school of opera, in which subjects and personages identified with each separate country of our composite kingdom shall be dealt with by librettists and composers who belong to that particular portion of the soil. In saying this we would not be understood to assert that the highest form of literary or musical expression is marked by national characteristics—the truth lies probably the other way; but it seems clear that in the direction indicated we might hope for works that would, at least, be to England what the best products of the opéra comique are to France. On this account we rejoice over the warm welcome that has been accorded to "Shamus O'Brien." Dr. Stanford has been fortunate with regard to his libretto. There is, it is true, nothing remarkably new or ingenious in the plot, derived from Sheridan Le Fanu's poem; but Mr. George H. Jessop has contrived plenty of effective incidents and situations that lend themselves admirably to—nay, absolutely ask for—musical treatment; his dialogue and lyrics, the latter especially, are full of humour, point, and charm, and his characters are natural, clearly drawn, admirably contrasted, and interesting as types. The main idea of the story is very simple. Shamus O'Brien has fought "again the Government" in the Rebellion of '98, and, a price having been put upon his head, the English soldiery, under Captain Trevor, are seeking him, assisted by Mike Murphy, who, being in love with O'Brien's wife Nora, naturally desires to get him out of the way. Shamus fools the English for a time, but his reckless bravery leads eventually to his capture. He is tried and condemned to death; but, on his way to the gallows, Father O'Flynn, the village priest, cuts the cords which bind him, and enables him to escape. As he flies up the hillside the soldiers fire, and hit, not Shamus, but the informer, Mike, who dies as the curtain falls. Besides these personages there is Kitty, Nora's sister, a bewitching little Colleen, who flirts outrageously with the susceptible Captain Trevor, and is responsible in consequence for a considerable decrease in his severity towards her unfortunate compatriots. We could forgive this, however, if the Captain were not otherwise so simple-minded and gullible as to become positively unreal. So dull-witted an officer would scarcely be selected as fit to cope with the resourceful Irish peasant. Captain Trevor is the one character that invites adverse criticism. Coming now to Dr. Stanford's music, we are bound to say that it exceeded even the anticipations of those who, knowing and admiring his "Irish" Symphony and his arrangements of the songs of his native land, expected something racy of the soil. Musically, "Shamus O'Brien" is simply a little masterpiece. For his material the composer has drawn freely on the peculiarities of Irish folk-song, but with so much tact, skill, delicacy, and humour have these materials been utilised, that only a careful analysis of the score in bulk would suffice to do justice to Dr. Stanford's work in this direction. And the fact that his effects are achieved by quite simple means naturally increases our admiration. Here is no cunningly contrived web of Leitmotiven, no elaborate scheme of thematic developments founded on a few national rhythms or melodic figures. The melodies in "Shamus O'Brien" are distinct "tunes," independent of one another in all but their common indebtedness to the peculiarities of Irish folk-music. They are, moreover, allotted to the voices, the orchestra being kept in the main to the task of accompanying and assisting the vocal melody, and, when opportunity serves, of discreetly commenting upon it. That it does this in the most interesting, ingenious, and charming way, and without for a moment ignoring the demands of the modern ear for "colour," goes almost without saying, for Dr. Stanford has long ago shown his fondness for rich effects of this kind and his ability to obtain them. The score is so satisfactory as a whole that it seems almost unfair to specialize; but we cannot refrain from naming a few of the numbers that gave us so much pleasure. The most striking thing in the work, to our thinking, is the solo sung by Nora, in which she describes how "for the last two nights in the midnight gloom" she has heard the cry of the "Banshee" foreboding, as she thinks, her husband's "knell of doom." The passage beginning "A grave yawns cold, In the churchyard mould," is not only most original and impressive, but shows imaginative qualities of a very high order, and the wailing phrase sung by the "Banshee" herself, which in the most blood-curdling way runs through the music of the last scene, in which the melancholy procession wends its way to the gallows, is scarcely less worthy of admiration. Next to these, though it is in quite another vein, must be placed Shamus's song, "I've sharpened my sword for the sake of ould Erin," a bold, rugged strain that is noble enough to be adopted as a national air. Mike's plaintive song, "Ochone, when I used to be young," is another little gem full of charm and pathos. Among the humorous pieces (of which there are many) the most salient are—Kitty's song, "Where is the man that is coming to marry me," which is simply delightful; Father O'Flynn's first solo, enumerating the gifts and qualities of Shamus; the quaint duets for Kitty and the Captain, "Well, he'd take me by the hand, — D'ye understand?" and "So it's kisses you are craving, you big soldier man!" the duet in the second act for Mike and the Captain, "O, yer honour, don't be hard"; and the scene for Shamus, Nora, and the chorus, "I know ye are brave, as brave can be," with its haunting refrain of "Oh! boys, listen to Shamus!" sung again at the end of the opera, as the people jeer at the soldiers while Shamus escapes over the hill. The chief honours of the performance (a remarkably good one in every way, and the stage management of which did great credit to Sir Augustus Harris, under whose direction the work was produced) fell to Miss Kirkby Lunn (Nora), Miss Maggie Davies (Kitty), Mr. Joseph O'Mara (Mike), and Mr. Denis O'Sullivan (Shamus); Mr. Magrath and Mr. W. H. Stephens did good service as Father O'Flynn and Captain Trevor, and the chorus not only sang well, but acted and danced with remarkable intelligence. The opera was conducted on the opening night (and again on St. Patrick's Day) by the composer, but has since been directed by Mr. Henry J. Wood.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

It will not be necessary to deal at any great length at present with these performances, for the majority of the programmes have consisted mainly of familiar works. Commencing with the Concert of Saturday, February 22, it may be mentioned that a beautiful performance was given of Mozart's String Quintet in D, under Dr. Joachim's leadership, and that his own performance of Bach's Chaconne was as unsurpassable as ever. Miss Eibenschütz played with all possible refinement three slight pieces by living composers—Leschetizky, Olsen, and Gernsheim. Miss Louise Phillips was artistic in songs by Arne, Davidoff, Mendelssohn, and Franz, and Schumann's characteristic Pianoforte Trio in F (Op. 80) completed the scheme.

On the following Monday Schubert's favourite Quartet in D minor opened the proceedings. This work is more popular than the Quartet in G (Op. 161), though the latter is the finer of the two. Beethoven's genial String Trio in G (Op. 9, No. 3) was the other concerted work. Mr. Isidor Cohn played neatly, but in a somewhat hard and perfunctory way, two pieces by Chopin, and Madame de Fonblanque sang agreeably airs by Secchi and Arne.

Mozart's most beautiful String Quintet, that in G minor, was exquisitely rendered by Dr. Joachim and his associates on Saturday, February 29, as was the revised version of Brahms's early Pianoforte Trio in B (Op. 8). Always artistic in everything he attempts, Mr. Leonard Borwick gave a model reading of Bach's French Suite in E (No. 6), and Dr. Joachim played Tartini's Sonata, "Il Trillo del Diavolo," as he alone can play it. Mr. Arthur Oswald was acceptable in well selected songs.

On the 2nd ult. Arensky's Pianoforte Trio in D minor (Op. 32) was performed for the first time at these Concerts, its actual first rendering in London having been at Mr. Siloti's Concert last December, when it was duly noticed in The Musical Times as an interesting example of the modern Russian school. M. Sapellnikoff, Dr. Joachim, and Mr. Paul Ludwig rendered all possible justice to this typically Slavonic work. Mendelssohn's delightful Quartet in E flat (Op. 44, No. 3) was also given; and the pianoforte solos played by M. Sapellnikoff, consisting of comparatively speaking minor pieces by Haydn, Mendelssohn, and Chopin, as well as the unaccompanied Bach's Suite as interpreted by Dr. Joachim, were unimpeachable. Madame Amy Sherwin was agreeable in songs by Mozart, Schubert, and Schumann.

On Saturday, the 7th ult., the Arensky Trio was repeated "by desire," and Mozart's ever-welcome Clarinet Quintet was given, with Mr. Clinton in the principal part, which was for so many years intimately associated with the deceased clarinettist, Mr. Lazarus. M. Sapellnikoff, who has considerably moderated his style since he first came among us, played some pieces by Schumann and Chopin with much effect, and Dr. Joachim gave his favourite Barcarolle and Scherzo, by Spohr. Miss Ada Crossley, who is a charming young vocalist, won deserved favour in a song "Alla Stella confidente," by V. Robaudi, and other vocal pieces.

Mr. Mark Hambourg showed the rapid progress he is making by a really fine performance of Schumann's magnificent Fantasia in C (Op. 17) at the Concert on the following Monday. The effect with an instrument fitted with Erard's new resonators was superb in the middle movement, and scarcely a wrong note could be detected in the fiery Coda in which so many pianists come to grief. Beethoven's Harp Quartet in E flat (Op. 74) and Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte Quartet in B flat (Op. 41) were the concerted works in this programme, and Miss Helen Buckley made a favourable impression in songs by Grieg and Goring Thomas.

A Beethoven programme was offered on Saturday, the 14th ult., the instrumental pieces being the bright Serenade Trio in D (Op. 8), the Quartet in F minor (Op. 95), and the Sonata in C sharp minor (Op. 27, No. 2), the last-named being played in a very refined style by Mr. Leonard Borwick. Mr. David Bispham gave an expressive rendering of the "Liederkreis," a beautiful set of songs too rarely heard. Similarly brief record is only required concerning the Concert of Monday, the 16th, the concerted works being Beethoven's Quartet in F (Op. 59, No. 1) and Rubinstein's favourite Sonata in D for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 18). Dr. Joachim played Schumann's somewhat laboured Violin Fantasia (Op. 131), and Mr. Mark Hambourg displayed brilliant execution in Raff's Variations in D minor. The finished vocalisation of Madame Bertha Moore gave effect to songs by Jensen, Meyer-Helmund, and Taubert.

St. James's Hall was too small for the number of people who desired to be present at the Concert of Saturday, the 21st ult., Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins being invariably an enormous attraction when the solo parts are played by Lady Hallé and Dr. Joachim, as they were on this occasion. Schumann's beautiful Quartet in A minor (Op. 41, No. 1) was the first piece in the programme, and Brahms's very impressive Pianoforte Quintet in F minor (Op. 34) brought the performance to a most effective conclusion. Miss Fanny Davies of course rendered the fullest justice to three of Scarlatti's harpsichord pieces, and Miss Mabel Berrey was charming as the vocalist.

We cannot at present notice the two final Concerts of the season and must now conclude with the performance of Monday, the 23rd ult. In this programme there was a novelty—namely, a Sonata in G minor, by Robert Kahn (Op. 5). The composer is a native of Mannheim and is now in his thirty-first year. He has written a considerable amount of chamber music and a Serenade for orchestra. The Pianoforte and Violin Sonata (played by Dr. Joachim and Miss Eibenschütz) shows conclusively that Kahn is a cultivated musician and deserves the encouragement he has received from several eminent members of his profession. The work is in three movements and in customary form, and, moreover, perfectly easy to follow; but we failed to detect much individuality of style in any of the movements. In other words, it seemed, at a first hearing, to be more academic than original. A magnificent performance was given of Beethoven's favourite Quintet in C (Op. 29), by Dr. Joachim and his associates, and the great violinist played three of Brahms's Hungarian Dances and a fourth by way of encore. The pianist was Miss Eibenschütz, who was admirable in four of Schumann's latest pieces.

THURSDAY SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS.

Mr. Hans Brousil commenced his season in the Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 5th ult., with Schubert's majestic String Quintet in C (Op. 163), a representative work that never fails to obtain a cordial welcome when interpreted with such sympathy and unity as on this occasion by Messrs. Otto Peiniger, W. Ackroyd, E. Tomlinson, T. Werge, and Hans Brousil. The beauties of the Adagio and the Scherzo could scarcely have been more adequately developed. Schubert's songs, "Erlafsee" and "Undeguld," were given by Miss Amelia Holding, and Tschaïkowsky's serenade, "Balmy Night," was in the safe hands of Mr. Arthur L. Oswald. Mr. Otto Peiniger had two violin solos, and Chopin's Ballade in G minor was expressively played by Mr. Septimus Webbe, who, joined by Mr. Brousil, effectively closed the programme with Mendelssohn's Variations (Op. 17).

Rubinstein was drawn upon for the first part of the Concert on the 19th ult. The instrumental piece was the Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello (Op. 18) in D major, played with artistic feeling by Miss Muriel Elliot and Mr. Brousil. The refined method of Mr. William Nicholl found excellent opportunity in "Du bist wie eine Blume," and the duets "The Hour of Parting" and "Birdie" were well sung by Mesdames Clara Samuell and Marian McKenzie. In the miscellaneous portion Mr. Nicholl again displayed charm of voice and style in Macfarlane's "Marguerite" and Park's "The Miller's Daughter," accompanying himself on the pianoforte. Miss Jessie Grimson, the clever young violinist, won favour by her execution of Spohr's Adagio in E flat (Op. 145) and Sarasate's "Habanera," and Miss Muriel Elliot played with facility a couple of Liszt's compositions.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Not the least important of the Concerts given by the Royal Academy of Music are those devoted to the interests of its organ students. Probably few music-lovers realise how great an influence is exercised by organists in the cultivation of a pure taste and in spreading a love of the art. They are, indeed, its missionaries, for they carry it in its most serious form into the most distant towns and villages, and upon their ability and enthusiasm depends, in no small measure, the cultivation of music in their respective neighbourhoods. This being so, it is to be regretted that the programme of the Recital on the 9th ult., at the Queen's Hall, contained no example by an English composer; for not only have English organists written many fine works thoroughly in sympathy with the genius of the instrument, but there are many living writers who have every right to be encouraged, and who, there is good reason to believe, would give us many high-class works if there were a likelihood of their efforts obtaining wider recognition. The two most important performances on the 9th ult. were those of Rheinberger's Pastoral Sonata, which was admirably played by Mr. Eustace Turner, and Widor's Symphony in F, the orchestral character and brilliant writing of the latter being excellently rendered by Mr. George D. Cunningham. Miss Claiborne Dixon showed considerable executive dexterity in the last two movements from Guilmant's first Sonata in D minor—miscalled in the programme a Symphony—and the effectiveness of the combination of organ and violin was well shown in an Adagio by Merkel, which was sympathetically played by Mr. William Beazley and Mr. W. H. Reed. The instrumental music was pleasantly diversified by vocal solos sung in a meritorious manner by Miss Hubi-Newcombe, Miss Margaret Drysdale, and Mr. David W. Baxter. Miss Clara Williams and Mr. F. Baring Ranalow also sang with taste two duets by Saint-Saëns, and Miss Katie Thomas, one of the most promising elocutionists of the Academy, recited Lord Lytton's poem "The wife of Miletus."

The students of the Institution also gave an excellent Concert on the 11th ult., at the Imperial Institute. A considerable portion of the programme was occupied by choral works, consisting of Spohr's setting of the 24th Psalm, "The earth is the Lord's," Goring Thomas's setting of the 30th Psalm, "Out of the deep," and part-songs by Barnby, G. A. Macfarren, and Eaton Faning, all of which were sung in a very praiseworthy manner by the choir, under the conductorship of Mr. Henry R. Eyers. Saint-Saëns's vocal quartet, "Justitia Domini Rectæ," was well rendered by Messrs. W. Price, J. F. Keel, D. Jones, and R. Chalcraft; and Miss S. Kaiser sang the waltz song from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet." Some very creditable pianoforte playing was contributed by the Misses Isabel Coates, Florence A. F. Dawes, and Josephine Taylor, a harp solo by Miss Annie Hughes greatly pleased the large audience, and no less appreciated were the violin pieces cleverly rendered by Miss Edie Reynolds and Miss Elsie Southgate.

There was not very much to notice in the Students' Concert at St. James's Hall, on February 24. Two movements from a Pianoforte Trio in C minor, by Schütt, were carefully rendered by three young lady pupils, and a Pianoforte Quartet, or a portion thereof, by Joseph C. Holbrook (student) showed that the young composer has considerable natural ability worthy of development. Two movements from Smetana's String Quartet in E minor were also commendably rendered. Among the students who gave ample evidence that a successful future is at their command, with careful study, were Misses M. Philpott, Rodbard, F. A. T. Dawes, and J. C. G. Taylor (pianists), and Miss Lilian H. Burgess, a soprano vocalist. The select choir, consisting of sixty-five voices under the conductorship of Mr. H. R. Eyers, was heard to considerable advantage in Goring Thomas's expressive setting of the 130th Psalm, with Miss Lilian Foote as the soloist.

The Competitions for the Llewelyn Thomas and Evill Prizes took place on the 14th ult. The Llewelyn Thomas Prize was awarded to Ethel Newcombe (of Runcorn, Cheshire), and the examiners highly commended May John and S. A Gomersall. The Evill Prize was awarded to Gwilym Richards (of Newport, Mon.), and the examiners highly commended W. Leetham-Reynolds. The Competition for the Goldberg Prize took place on the 16th ult.; the prize was awarded to Gwilym Richards (of Newport, Mon.). The Competition for the Potter Exhibition took place on the 18th ult.; the prize was awarded to R. Neville Flux (of Bromley, Kent). The Competition for the Robert Cocks and Co. Prize took place on the 19th ult., and the prize was awarded to Charles H. W. Hickin (of London). The examiners commended Hubert G. Oke. The Competition for the Louisa Hopkins Memorial Prize took place on the 23rd ult., and the prize was awarded to Gertrude Peppercorn (of West Horsley, Surrey). The examiners highly commended Isabel Coates.

MUSICAL ARTISTS' SOCIETY.

A new Pianoforte Trio in A, by Mr. A. Davidson Arnott, was produced at the Musical Artists' Society's seventy-sixth Concert, at St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 16th ult. It is an attractive, well-written work, which, though not displaying any striking individuality, pleases and interests by its melodiousness and artistic finish. Of the four movements, the opening Allegro moderato deserves special commendation for the charm of its subject-matter, its sonorous ensemble, and general effectiveness. There is genuine and well-expressed feeling in the Adagio, and the bright sparkle of the Perpetuum mobile of the Scherzo is excellently contrasted by the quiet, reflective character of an engaging trio. The vigorous Finale is somewhat strongly suggestive of a famous classical model, and we would urge its gifted young composer to re-write it, so as to give reminiscence-hunters no chance of indulging in their futile sport. The performance was far from satisfactory; and here we would once more express our genuine regret that a Society whose aim is so fully deserving of all public encouragement and success should take so little pains to make its Concerts endurable to an educated audience by providing really adequate, artistic performances. Mr. Arnott's Trio, but still more Rubinstein's String Quartet in G (Op. 17), suffered greatly at the hands of the executants. Intonation, tone, phrasing, expression, finish, and ensemble all left much to desire; consequently something approaching chaos and cacophony seemed to rule here and there. The Society will never attract music-lovers until this state of affairs is remedied. The programme included two weak, immature songs by Miss Margaret Ford, sung by Miss Katie Thomas; a sentimental Introduction and very ordinary Polonaise (Op. 20) by M. René Ortmans, played by the composer; two musicianly, agreeable trifles for the pianoforte by Mr. George Aitken; and Schumann's inspired and elevating "Er der Herrlichste von Allen," which was sung by Madame Edith Stuart as if it were an insipid "shop-song." The accompaniment was also totally inadequate. We did not stay for the remaining five numbers—including a Haydn Quartet—of the Brobdignagian programme.

MUSICAL GUILD.

The Concert of the 3rd ult. will remain memorable in the history of the above enterprising Society, for Dr. Joseph Joachim came, "by invitation," and with him a crowd of admirers which completely filled Kensington Town Hall. A perfectly beautiful performance of Mozart's glorious String Quintet opened the interesting programme. The "Geiger-König" led his young English fellow artists, Messrs. Arthur Bent, Alfred Hobday, Percy Kearne, and Paul Ludwig, as only a master can lead, and they followed his call with enthusiastic devotion and the confidence begot by their own artistic worth. We have rarely heard a more perfect ensemble, or a more thoroughly enjoyable interpretation of a masterpiece. Miss Fanny Davies played Brahms's superb Variations and Fugue on a theme of Handel's with great breadth and power; the Fugue especially was splendidly rendered. Miss Fillunger was in her best form, which is equivalent to saying that her songs, Schubert's "Junge Nonne" and Brahms's "Wie rafft' ich mich auf" and the delicious "Ruhe, Süssliebchen," were sung with rare depth of expression and finish. A fine performance of Brahms's first Violin and Pianoforte Sonata (Op. 78) by Dr. Joachim and Miss Davies completed the programme.

The final Concert of the season, on the 17th ult., opened with Brahms's String Quartet in B flat (Op. 67), which, with the exception of the momentary confusion due to two wrong entries by the violoncello, was extremely well played by Messrs. Bent, Wallace Sutcliffe, Alfred Hobday, and T. Egerton Hill. Mr. Hobday deserves a special word of praise for his exquisite playing of the famous viola part in the Agitato, one of the most original and beautiful movements ever conceived by master-mind. Madame Himing, whose fine, rich contralto voice and expressive style should secure for her more recognition than she seems to have met with, sang the air "O my heart is weary," from the late Goring Thomas's "Nadeshda," and Handel's popular "Ombra mai fu." She sings with perfect intonation, great finish, and deep feeling. Mr. Hill played two violoncello solos, Davidoff's "Cantilena" and an enormously difficult, but very effective and—mirabile dictu!—musically interesting show-piece, an Allegro vivace by Klengel. He was equally successful in both compositions. Mr. Alfred Wall's clever Violin and Pianoforte Sonata, first performed at Queen's Hall a few months ago, and then commented upon, closed the Concert. It was ably played by the composer and Miss Annie Grimson.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The Orchestral Concert given at St. James's Hall on the 6th ult. was, in at least one respect, the most interesting ever given by the pupils of this flourishing institution. We refer to the production of three movements from a Symphony in A minor by S. Coleridge-Taylor, a young scholar of whose works we have on many previous occasions spoken in terms of high praise. This Symphony is not only his most ambitious, and, we may add, most successful effort, but is probably the most remarkable piece of work yet produced by any pupil of the College. For in Mr. Taylor we have that genuine rara avis, a student who possesses distinct individuality. This was clearly shown in the Larghetto affettuoso in Mr. Taylor's work. He calls it a "Lament," and well does the music answer to the description. Chaste and yet deeply-felt expression is here united to beautiful workmanship, of which the appropriately subdued but fascinating colouring of the orchestration is not the least remarkable feature. The first movement, an elaborate Allegro appassionata, is less remarkable for the strength of the ideas than the variety of its rhythms, the bright transparent scoring, and the youthful vigour and buoyancy pervading every bar. The Scherzo also displays Mr. Taylor's command of unusual rhythm. It is a very spirited movement, to which a melodious Trio, in 5-4 time, interrupted by an occasional 6-4 bar, gives the requisite contrast. The work was splendidly rendered by an orchestra consisting chiefly of present and former pupils of the College, amongst whom there were twenty-five ladies. Admirable performances were also given of a "Festal" Overture in C, by Dr. Josef Joachim, and Brahms's "Academic Festival" Overture. The former was written for the jubilee of the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, and is as "festal" in character as can be desired. The composer conducted, and once more proved himself an inspiriting and wholly admirable conductor. Mr. William Hurlstone (scholar) played his Pianoforte Concerto in D, on which we expressed an opinion some months ago when it was performed at the College; that opinion we see no need to change after a second hearing. Mr. Norman McLeod Jones, a highly promising young tenor, sang the air "Now is the hour of soft enchantment," from Goring Thomas's "Nadeshda"; Miss Agnes Nicholls was heard in Weber's "Leise, Leise" ("Der Freischütz"), of which she gave a fluent and expressive rendering; and Mr. Emlyn Davies's fine voice and dramatic style were exactly suited in the fine air "Woo thou thy snowflake," from Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Ivanhoe." Professor Stanford conducted. We have but little space left to refer to the Chamber Concerts given at the College on February 26 and the 18th ult. At the former we heard fair performances of Schumann's Spring Quartet in A minor, and Mozart's Trio for pianoforte, clarinet, and viola. The choral class sang Schumann's part-song for female voices, "Jäger Wohlgemuth," and Tschaïkowsky's melodious and unpretentious, but undeniably effective and pleasing, "Nature and Love," in which the soli were sung by Messrs. Thatcher, Shaw, and Hayden. On the 18th Miss Marie Motto and Mr. William Trehearne gave an excellent performance of Goldmark's interesting Suite for violin and pianoforte (Op. 11), and Quartets by Beethoven (Op. 59, No. 1) and Smetana (in E minor) were included.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC LECTURES.

KUHNAU'S "BIBLE SONATAS."

A Lecture of considerable artistic attractiveness was delivered on February 26, at the Royal Academy of Music, by Mr. Edgar F. Jacques, assisted by Mr. J. S. Shedlock at the pianoforte and organ, the subject being the "Biblical Sonatas of Kuhnau." The lecturer began by reminding his listeners of the proclivity of humanity to overlook the smallness of the degrees of development which marked all progress, and to regard their heroes not only as great, which they were, but as unnatural, which they were not. Hence specially gifted men became isolated from their contemporaries, and the efforts of those who had preceded them and who had enabled the giants of art to attain their pre-eminence were frequently forgotten. In this manner Handel had overshadowed Purcell, whose remarkable gifts we were only now duly appreciating. The intelligent study of musical history—i.e., not the mere committal to memory of a few biographical details and dates—had of late years served to show the injustice which had been done to many earnest workers in the cause of art, and amongst them to Johann Kuhnau, the predecessor of Johann Sebastian Bach as cantor of St. Thomas's Church, Leipzig, and the composer of the "Bible Sonatas." Kuhnau was a musician of a type by no means common in his day, a type indeed which we are inclined to believe to be peculiar to the nineteenth century. He was a musician whose activity was not confined to the domain of music, but was manifested in various other directions, and more particularly in that of literature. It was a peculiarity of what may be termed the literary musician, that in his musical compositions he always strove to express a definite meaning, and, unlike the poetical composer, was not satisfied in merely producing beautiful "sound-patterns." Kuhnau was born at Geysing, in Saxony, in April, 1660, just a month before Charles II. of England ascended the throne. The remarkable abilities of Kuhnau for science and art early showed themselves, and in addition to his great musical abilities he studied mathematics and languages with conspicuous success, and was a man of deep thought and remarkable originality. The "Bible Sonatas" were six in number, and although there were doubtless previous efforts to express the definite in music, these sonatas were the first examples we possessed of legitimate programme music. The two considered at this Lecture were the first and second, which have been recently published by Messrs. Novello, and are severally entitled "The fight between David and Goliath" and "David curing Saul by means of music." Not the least interesting portion of these sonatas is the relation by Kuhnau of the Bible stories with which they are connected. The chief points sought to be illustrated in the first sonata are—1. Stamping and defying of Goliath; 2. The terror of the Israelites, and their prayer to God at the sight of the terrible enemy; 3. The courage of David, his desire to humble the pride of the giant, and his childlike trust in God; 4. The contest of words between David and Goliath, and the contest itself, in which Goliath is wounded in the forehead by a stone, so that he falls to the ground and is slain; 5. The fight with the Philistines, and how they are pursued by the Israelites and slain with the sword; 6. The exultation of the Israelites over their victory; 7. The praise of David sung by women in alternate choirs; 8. And, finally, general joy, expressing itself in hearty dancing and leaping. In the second sonata were represented—First, Saul's sadness and madness; second, David's refreshing harp-playing, and tranquillity restored to the king's mind. Considering the striking character of these sonatas the lecturer truly said it was astonishing that they had never been published since their original issue in 1700 until now, the result of some recent researches on the Continent by Mr. Shedlock. After Mr. Jacques had played the various themes identified with the programme, Mr. Shedlock played the sonatas, the first on the organ and the second on the pianoforte; the former instrument endowing the sustained passages with more significance than could the pianoforte. Musicians who take an interest in programme music should certainly possess themselves of these sonatas.

DR. BRIDGE'S LECTURES.

A highly instructive and interesting series of Lectures has been delivered during the last month by Professor Bridge, at the Royal Academy of Music, under the title of "Twelve Good Musicians," the period covered being from Tallis to Purcell (1585 to 1695). Tallis, the lecturer said, was the founder of our Cathedral music, and Purcell brought it to a perfection beyond which it had never soared. In speaking of Tallis as the founder of our Cathedral music he did not forget the work of Marbeck and Tye. The former was the first to set the English Common Prayer Book to music (i.e., melody only), in 1550, a book which became the model for our "Cathedral Use." Tye wrote many anthems, and after rendering the first fourteen chapters of the Acts of the Apostles into so-called poetry, he set these verses to somewhat elaborate music. But with the accession of Queen Mary the Latin service was restored, and our Cathedral music was, so to speak, "nipped in the bud." It was under Elizabeth that the English Prayer Book was finally adopted, and English composers set to work in earnest to contribute of their best to the music of the Church. To this day Tallis's Service in the Dorian mode was in regular use in our Cathedrals, and his name was also always connected with the Responses sung on festival days; the latter being probably founded, to a great extent, upon those of Marbeck. Tallis, with his pupil Byrd, had the monopoly granted them of printing music, which, however, did not seem to pay, for, in 1577, they petitioned for a lease of crown lands value £40. In this petition it was stated as follows: "Tallis is now aged, having served the Queen and her ancestors almost forty years, and never had but one preferment, a lease given him by Queen Mary. Byrd, being called to her Majesty's service at Lincoln Cathedral, where he was well settled, is now, through a great charge of wife and children, fallen into debt and great necessity." As a result of the petition they got lands worth £30 a year, but they ceased to print music, although they would not permit anyone else to do so. At this Lecture a most rare copy of the first edition of Day's Psalter, published in 1560, which had recently been discovered at Westminster Abbey, was exhibited. This is the earliest publication in which the services of the Church are found harmonised, and it also contains several anthems by various composers, one of them being by Tallis, and a model of what a short anthem should be. The lecturer said it should be remembered that the time of the publication of this fine specimen of English church music was the period of Palestrina, whose title of the "Saviour of church music," if justified with regard to Italy, was certainly not so in reference to England.

The other lectures were devoted to the consideration of the life and works of Orlando Gibbons, William and Henry Lawes, Jenkins, Locke, Humphries, Dr. Blow and his pupil Henry Purcell, concerning all of whom much valuable information was given in an attractive manner.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

The causes which have led to revolutions in art are now worthily occupying considerable attention, and consequently much interest was attached to a paper, entitled "The Bardi Coterie," read on the 10th ult. by Mrs. M. C. Brownlow at the Musical Association. The work of Giovanni Bardi and his friends, Vincenzo Galilei, Giuglio Caccini, and Jacopo Peri, and their endeavours to revive the music-drama of ancient Greece, are familiar to all music-lovers; but the influences that caused them to make these efforts which had such remarkable results are less well known. The lecturer said that Florence and Venice, being the greatest of the Republican cities which rose from the ruins of the Empire, were important centres of trade; and in this connection it was noticeable that Venice, from its position, was the more directly affected by Byzantine influence, while in Florence the constant in-and-out flow of Frenchmen, Spaniards, Englishmen, and Northmen generally had considerable effect upon social life. The nature of the Florentines was democratic and inimical to the institutions of the Middle Ages. Florence being a state as well as a city, peculiar strenuousness was given to the responsibilities of each individual. In the semi-patriarchal arrangements of domestic life the younger servants shared the lessons given to the master's children, while the great secular schools placed education within the reach of all. The nobles were, moreover, all merchants; consequently caste distinctions were unknown in social life, degrees of culture and difference of taste alone differentiating various cliques. Archæology was the most popular study, and the masques and pageants, for which the city was celebrated, were arranged in classic guise, even when they dealt with Scriptural subjects. Towards the close of the fifteenth century Lorenzo di Medici had founded at Florence a Platonic Academy, at which the relative merits of the Christian and Pagan religions were freely discussed. To this classic culture, freedom of thought, paganism, and opposition of the official ecclesiastical ideal, which were the special characteristics of Florence, might be traced the rise of the natural or realistic school in painting, a movement which at the close of the sixteenth century found its parallel in that new musical departure which was ultimately to break the bonds of scholastic ecclesiastical precedent and set musical art free, a movement which was originated and started by that group of musicians who constituted the Bardi Coterie.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.

Dr. Hubert Parry, at his second Lecture on Idealism and Realism in Music, delivered at the Royal Institution, dealt with the important matter of musical criticism. It might, he said, be too much to say that the professional critic was half a composer; but it would not be too much to aver that every good composer was a critic. Unless the composer had the sense of self-criticism highly developed, he could not make judicious choice of the multitude of ideas which came to him when composing; neither could he judge of the appropriateness of the processes and details which were needful to form a complete work of art. The composer of amiable, easy-going music was in little danger of producing ill-expressed or crude phrases. The danger of inappropriateness or inadequacy of expression was chiefly incurred by those who strove to instil personality into what they did, or desired to experiment beyond the range of familiar processes. Bach and Beethoven exercised an enormous amount of self-criticising energy. They cast and re-cast their ideas, their crititical instinct growing keener as their work improved. Bach's improvements nearly always consisted of amplification. The design was expanded, passages were extended by modulations, the latter frequently supplying an interest which was almost wholly lacking in the original version of the work. Beethoven practised self-criticism to a far greater extent than Bach. He spent years over the form of presentation of an idea, and the design of a work was sketched out over and over again to ensure the perfect balance of its sections, the proper distribution of its modulations, and exactly the right places being assigned to the climaxes. These, indeed, were two remarkable critics, for they looked at their work from the inside while they were building and from the outside when they had built. Their criticisms were consequently the highest development of artistic instinct that it was possible to imagine. The chief difference in the way in which the composer and critic judged a work was that the former estimated the details as highly as he did the whole, which the critic did not. The true composer also looked forward, because he was always anxious to build upon what he had learnt, while the critic looked backwards, as he had to judge by the light of the past. The critic, however, could go far ahead of existing art if his mind had been duly expanded by plentiful experience. The criticism which was dictated merely by education was often very deceptive. It was not so long ago that most musicians were so impressed with Sonata Form that every composition which did not conform to it was judged by them as second-rate. This was an instance in which the critic had been misled by too narrow an ideal, and was a kind of idealism which would have hindered artistic progress, if composers had not had some capacity for suffering and enduring. A similar kind of mistake followed from the habit of confusing the fugue of theory with the fugue of fact. The fugue of theory was very valuable for educational purposes, but fugues written on the lines of the schoolmen were rarely fit to be listened to as music. On the other hand, fugues which really illustrated the elastic possibilities of the form were generally condemned unless they were signed by J. S. Bach. Such misfortunes arose from the want of perception of the development of the ideal in musical art. It was only natural that people should like what was consistent with their habits. Whenever the method employed was strange the human mind was not prepared for it, and were the ideal ever so perfectly carried out, the result must fall to a certain extent upon deaf ears. The conventions of the hour also affected the critic, and he was prone to think beautiful that which was generally admired. The inexpansiveness of habit made it a dangerous standard of criticism, although it was one of the happiest checks against the sudden and hurtful changes dictated by vanity and levity. To judge by the somersaults that had been witnessed in the past few years in public taste as to what was ideally beautiful, it might almost be thought that beauty was purely a matter of convention, but, in point of fact, it was a matter of relativity, and different styles required different methods. It was, therefore, imperatively necessary that the attitude of mind of the composer should be clearly understood by the critic when estimating the artistic value of a new work. The Germans adopted the right road in programme music by suggesting the real only in terms of the ideal. Schumann gave many of his pieces suggestive names, but he very rarely resorted to realistic devices. Frenchmen, on the other hand, were unconsciously led the moment they adopted a programme into trying to express their subject in mechanically realistic terms, which, moreover, were doubly artificial, for they presented the concrete idea in its theatrical aspect. The instinct of the French for the stage was indeed so great that it dominated their concert-room music. From this position the descent into license and extravagance was short. License might be described as a method, or lack of method, in composition which ran counter to the widest generalisation that could be adduced from the concensus of opinion of the best composers; and extravagance might be defined as an appeal to the senses without any corresponding reference to the higher qualities of human nature. Some programmes might justify an orchestral effect suggestive of upsetting a dining-room table covered with crockery; but there was nothing ideal in that, and it was not in the least consistent with the process of artistic development. A battle opera might need the firing of machine guns, but it would be a sign of singular musical poverty if the effect were made to depend upon the noise of the firing instead of on the devices which were appropriate to the art. A mighty musical thought might be justly expressed by the greatest roar of sound that man could produce, but a responsible and self-respecting composer would abstain from devising earth-shaking effects to express mere empty twaddle.

At the final Lecture Dr. Parry described and analysed the attitude and influence of the public, which, he said, was a highly composite organisation, comprising the light-headed people who rejoiced in the reputation of being smart, as well as those whom they sometimes spoke of as the "great unwashed"—the serious as well as the gay, the idealist and the realist. As regards the distinction of classes, the qualities of mind and emotions which were common to them all made them, in spite of their difference of associations, like very much the same things. The duchess and her bootmaker might admire a great singer with equal enthusiasm—especially if the song were "Home, sweet home." A fashionable young man might have quite as genuine an admiration for "Tristan" or the Ninth Symphony as his tailor. But the difference of attitude between the idealist and the realist might be a vital source of divergence. Of course few men were wholly idealists or wholly realists, and men in whom the ideal preponderated had different conceptions of the ideal. The music of Brahms was regarded by some people to be in the highest sense ideal, since he dealt with ideas which were essential to music and treated in the manner peculiar to the art; but, on the other hand, many would maintain that Wagner's music was the highest modern ideal. Wagner got the reputation of being ideal because he appealed so much to the type of creature that was generally recognised as idealistic. This type, which was more susceptible to impressions than to reason, easily took anything that excited it for an ideal form of art. The true idealist was such an important being in connection with art that he demanded careful consideration. He was generally a man who meant much more than he was capable of doing—doing, indeed, was not his strong point; but all the same he achieved a great deal by the influence his ardour exerted upon other human beings. It was the fervent faith of idealists of different stamp which had led the world to appreciate both Wagner and Brahms. It was not many years ago that those who had the courage to express their belief in Wagner's genius were judged by thousands of musicians as only fit to be classed with anarchists or blatant impostors. But the genuine emotional force, the infinite variety and subtlety of tone-colour, the apparent obscurity of design, the mystery and imagery of the Wagnerian scheme laid hold of the idealistic temperament, and the fervour and enthusiasm of the poetical and susceptible few infected the fashionable world; and when the fashionable world had given its verdict the rest of average mankind, who were led by the section of humanity which was most profusely advertised, entered into the charmed circuit, and by degrees the public became more or less Wagnerised, so that nothing now paid which was not to some extent flavoured with Wagnerism. The laudable open-mindedness of idealists to certain kinds of impressions made rigorous enquiries into the causes of effects distasteful to them. They had great perceptions and faculties of enjoyment, and sometimes very highly organised instincts for guessing the rights of an artistic question without being able to reason about it; and when the mental and emotional organisation was high, an idealist, under favourable training, arrived at the highest pitch of artistic perception. On the other hand, the complete realist was a man who wanted always to be sure of his ground, and was particularly alive to being taken in. He was entirely unsusceptible to artistic impressions as such. He liked pictures of railway stations and race meetings, and regarded music with profound distrust. Painting could be employed for advertisements, to fill up blank spaces on the walls of a house, and to perpetuate the features and forms of wealthy city magnates and famous politicians; but there was nothing to be done with music. It was everybody's property, and if it seemed to keep some people out of mischief for an hour or two it appeared particularly liable to lead its votaries into mischief when they were not practising or performing. Almost the only form of music which the practical man could put up with was the opera, partly because it gave him an opportunity to talk to his friends, and partly because he could at least see something which had a connection with a stage play. Men who were not naturally susceptible, or poetically imaginative, longed for some suggestion of concrete reality when listening to music. They could understand the reference to a thunderstorm, a lullaby, or a horse, but they did not regard the quality of the musical idea which expressed it as of much consequence. Perhaps the most surprising example of the fantastic which realism led to was afforded by battle music. Warfare was a mighty subject, but it seemed to have had a tendency to mislead composers into thinking that they had no need to deal in musical ideas, consequently great and little composers pursuing the same method had produced little better than absurdities. The most celebrated of such experiments was Kotzwara's "Battle of Prague," which not only was extremely popular in the early years of this century, but had also had a very long life, for it was still heard in certain matter-of-fact sections of society. It was more than a century old, for Kotzwara hanged himself in 1791. The most remarkable example, however, was Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," which showed how strangely a great mind might be misled by a faulty intention. These were the most inartistic types of programme music, and illustrated very forcibly the fallaciousness of a programme forming a complete means of musical salvation. The modern tendency towards definite characterisation seemed to be the inevitable consequence of the profuse development of resource which had been going on for years. Musical evolution appeared to be in the direction of greater nicety of expression. But it made all the difference whether the composer who sought to express a definite programme endeavoured to do so by simple realistic means, or whether he tempered the ideal means with a mere suggestion of realistic symbolism. We knew that Beethoven liked to have a subject in his mind to compose to, but the only way in which it showed itself was by its influence in keeping the music consistent and uniform. Admirable types of the right kind of treatment were to be found in Wagner. The music which accompanied Siegfried in his various moods always fitted ideally with the individual and the moment to which it was wedded. The lonely isolation of the wounded and dying Tristan and the depth of the tragedy of Siegfried's death were intensified by music which tore the heart out of the situation. Programme music had now acquired a special technique of characterisation which had been fostered by the great variety of experiments in design which had been recently made. Strong feeling permeated even such abstract musical works as symphonies. Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony was one of the most emotional of instrumental compositions. It was a study in deep moods. The public at large in the present day liked to be provided with a distinct programme, but it cared little for subtleties of thought, refinement of diction, or those beauties of detail which showed the serious love of art in the composer. The faculties of appreciation of a real work of art were possessed by the few, and therefore it was not surprising that the greatest works should be misunderstood and misjudged.

An interesting series of illustrations were given at the final Lecture by Dr. Parry and Miss Bramwell at the pianoforte, and by a number of students from the Royal College of Music, who sang several madrigals by early writers.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.

Mr. A. J. Hipkins read, on February 25, a comprehensive paper on the question of musical pitch, at the Society of Arts, the members of which have for many past years taken a lively interest in the matter. The history of their endeavours since 1859, when the diapason normal became law in France, was exhaustively related by the lecturer, whose long connection with Messrs. Broadwood also enabled him to give much interesting information concerning the pitch of the various forks which had been made as standards for the pitch of the pianofortes for the Philharmonic Concerts. The pitch was shown to have been gradually rising since the establishment of these Concerts in 1813, and, whereas at one time the Philharmonic pitch was the highest used in this country, it was now surpassed by many of the celebrated brass bands in the northern counties. The tendency of the various influences were shown to be all in the direction of raising the pitch, and it was therefore most desirable that a standard should be established and that that standard should be the diapason normal, which prevailed on the Continent and also had been accepted in America. The lecturer concluded by warmly commending the action of the Philharmonic Society in adopting the French pitch, which was recommended by a special committee of the Society of Arts in 1886. Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who occupied the chair, and several other well-known musicians supported the views of the lecturer, and spoke strongly in favour of the use of the diapason normal.

BOURNEMOUTH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The second Bournemouth Musical Festival, on the same lines as that of last year, took place in the Royal Opera House on the 20th ult. The day was a most unfavourable one, but the two Concerts of which the Festival consisted were well attended, and it was evident that the event had aroused considerable public interest. The programme, the same at both Concerts, was a judiciously arranged one, including at least two works never before heard in Bournemouth, Mr. F. H. Cowen's cantata "The Transfiguration" and Dr. J. F. Bridge's short meditation "He giveth His beloved sleep," each conducted by its composer. These were supplemented by "The Inchcape Rock," a choral ballad also by Dr. Bridge, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The executive resources of the Festival were fully equal to the task imposed upon them. The solo vocalists were Miss Gertrude Izard, Miss Greta Williams, Mr. Whitney Mockridge (who took the place of Mr. Charles Chilley, absent through serious indisposition), and Mr. Henry Bailey. The orchestra, which in the string section included a considerable proportion of local players, professional and amateur, was under the leadership of Mr. Charles Fletcher, and Mr. W. Lee officiated as organist. The chorus, a large body drafted not only from Bournemouth itself but from the surrounding district, had been trained by Dr. Lemare, who must have observed with much satisfaction the marked progress his forces have made since last year.

The Festival opened well with "The Transfiguration," and Mr. Cowen's beautiful music, notwithstanding an unfortunate sinking of pitch in the chorus "O Jesus, none but Thee," received praiseworthy treatment. The principals acquitted themselves well, and the accompaniments by the band, though occasionally wanting in delicacy, were carefully played. Still more satisfactory was the refined rendering of Dr. Bridge's "Meditation," an unpretentious little work, the only disappointing feature of which to many present seemed to be its brevity. The best performance of the whole Festival, however, was that of "The Inchcape Rock," which reflected the utmost credit on everyone who took part in it. Choir and orchestra were inspired by the attractive music with which the composer has clothed Southey's familiar ballad, with the result that no point was missed and no effect lost from the beginning to the final bar. "The Hymn of Praise," conducted by Dr. Lemare, brought the Festival to a close. In concluding this notice it is only just that due credit be given to Dr. Lemare, whose services in connection with the Festival cannot be over-estimated. His labours stretched back many months, and that they should bear such excellent fruit is a matter for sincere congratulation.

EMMA MUNDELLA.

Though many musicians have been lately taken from among us who were more prominently before the public than the accomplished lady whose loss we now record (on February 20) with sincere regret, yet it would be most ungrateful if, in the general outburst of grief at the loss of some of our distinguished leaders, we were to overlook the decease of others who, though less known, were perhaps in their sphere equally meritorious. There are some, not many perhaps, who bend without any ambitious murmur to the course of life-work which circumstances impose upon them; who undertake with alacrity the duties entrusted to them, however common-place, and fulfil them to the very utmost of their abilities—albeit it may be known all the time to their friends, if not to themselves, that they are deserving of a wider outlook and capable of higher functions. Amongst such as these was Emma Mundella. She was highly gifted by nature, inheriting undoubted musical talent from her mother's family, and through her father that sterling ability which has raised her uncle, the son of an expatriated Italian patriot, to the position of a leading English statesman. The early death of her father called into activity her best energies. Having received her first musical instruction in her home, she afterwards became a pupil of Mr. Arthur Page, who taught her the pianoforte and harmony.

When, in 1876, the Duke of Edinburgh and Sir Henry Cole opened the National Training School of Music, Emma Mundella, then just eighteen years of age, carried off the scholarship for pianoforte playing founded by the Corporation of Nottingham, and she received for three years instruction from Mr. Ernst Pauer, Sir Arthur Sullivan, Dr. Bridge, Dr. Stainer, Mr. Prout, and other well-known teachers in that school. The wide ground which this instruction covered—pianoforte, organ, harmony, counterpoint, composition, and singing—laid the foundation of that valuable experience which made her so useful in after life. When the National School of Music was suppressed, and its funds, instruments, library, and buildings were handed over to the Royal College of Music, Emma Mundella was one of the first to secure the diploma A.R.C.M. issued by the new Institution. Her first post was director of the music in St. Elphin's Clergy Daughters' School at Warrington, where her work was carried on with all the zeal and painstaking which always characterised her. On the opening of the Wimbledon High School in 1880, the whole of the curriculum of music was placed in her hands; and there will not be one of the many hundreds of young girls who came within her influence who will hesitate to testify to the benefit they have received from contact with her, not only from her actual teaching, but also from her lofty view of the duties of life and the honour of being a labourer. Not content with the usual amount of musical work which is the requirement of high school study, she inaugurated lectures on musical subjects, pianoforte recitals, started a "music circle" of past and present pupils for the encouragement of composition and vocal and instrumental performances, she also collected the first books for the formation of a musical library. Besides this tolerably large handful of occupation she managed also to perform occasional duty as organist at a London church, she received a large number of private pupils, and also gathered together a ladies' choir, which she herself conducted. Yet more, when the constitution of her classes required her to compose fresh music or make special instrumental or vocal arrangements of standard works, she was ready with them; several have been published by Messrs. Williams and by Messrs. Novello. Not the least among such efforts was the private production of "Antigone," acted and sung by girls only. But the most useful and most lasting monument of her skill and musicianship will probably be the "Day School Hymn-Book," which she undertook, we believe, at the suggestion of Miss Hastings, the well-known head mistress of Wimbledon High School. The first issue of this book contained the modest number of eighty-three hymns. It was remarkably well received and reviewed, and proved her to have such skill in selecting words and music which would win the heart of the young, that her publishers called upon her to enlarge the scope of her work and make the second issue much more comprehensive. The last labours of her too short life were concentrated on the completion of this Hymnal; the final proof-sheets had passed through her hands, and the book was actually being printed when, alas! she succumbed to her fatal illness. The book is now issued, and a copy lies before us. A novelty, for which she deserves great credit, is the introduction of French, German, and Latin words of hymns: these will be of great interest to schools, whether of girls or boys. The wide reading and the musical knowledge it displays are remarkable; here are old German, French, and English tunes, and many too-much neglected tunes of the English middle period; recent writers are represented by Dykes, Turle, Goss, Wesley, Smart, Gounod, and Barnby; while the special contributions of living composers show how many of her friends took a sincere interest in the success of the work. Among the many tunes which here appear for the first time, some of the most remarkable are from her pen. We wish it God-speed! It will no doubt be a source of great edification and pleasure to all those who take it up; but it awakes sad thoughts in those who know that her devotion to duty, her unflagging energy when physically unfit for such exacting labours, had much to do with her sudden collapse. Some of our readers may say that we have, after all, only described a very ordinary musical career, containing nothing of special note. Not so. Emma Mundella might have had only ordinary work to do, but she certainly did not do it in the ordinary way; no counting the minutes and reckoning the fees in her case! The secret of her extraordinary success and influence lay in the fact that she loved always to do her best, because work was to her a privilege as well as a pleasure, and also because she did not teach others from the height of a professional pedestal; she was down amongst their hearts with a loving penetrating sympathy. May her example be followed by the many who have had the good fortune to know her! Her noble character showed itself to the very last. When fully aware that her life was in jeopardy, and that the latest resources of modern science could offer but little hope of saving her, she met her fate with a courage and a cheerful resignation which crowned her career with a beautiful unity, and proved how deep-set were the sources from which had sprung her every-day impulses of duty, sincerity, and affection.

REVIEWS.

Novello's Parish Choir Book. Nos. 228-233. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This excellent series is being carried on with the evident desire to meet the requirements of all conditions and abilities of church choirs worthy of the name. Nos. 228 and 229 are settings of the Te Deum and Jubilate by Mr. Charles Macpherson, who has avoided repetition of the words and written in a manner that will present no difficulties to ordinary choirs. No. 230 will recommend itself to admirers of Gregorian music, being the Te Deum "after Merbecke"; the vocal part is furnished with the plain chant notation, to which is appended appropriate four-part harmonies in staff notation. Mr. Edgar Pettman supplies, in Nos. 231 and 232 respectively, very effective settings in chant form of the Te Deum and Benedicite. That of the latter may be particularly recommended. No. 233 consists of the Cantate Domino and Deus Misereatur—portions of the Church Services frequently much neglected—arranged in simple four-part harmony with an organ accompaniment by Mr. Ferris Tozer. The Cantate contains a portion for trebles in unison.

Messe Chorale. For Mixed Voices, with Organ Accompaniment. By Charles Gounod. [Alphonse Cary.]

This work, which has but recently been published in England, is the fourth Messe Solennelle by the renowned French composer, the other three being the Messe de St. Cécile, a second Messe Solennelle, and the Messe de Pâques. The example now under review dates from 1888, and is built upon a plain-song intonation which is not only frequently heard in the various numbers, but has also manifestly dictated the conception and treatment of the music throughout the work. The setting has by this means acquired great cohesion, and in expression a dignity and loftiness at times approaching severity, but admirably in keeping with the spirit of the sacred text. The Mass opens with the phrase already mentioned, which is announced in unison by the organ. After a brief prelude of sixteen bars, the voices begin the Kyrie in contrapuntal style, the first vocal appearance of what may be termed the motto phrase being allied with the words "Christe eleison," which are given forth emphatically by the sopranos, who subsequently sing it again, but this time softly and with fine effect, at the close of the number. It is used in a striking manner in augmented form and as a canto fermo in the Gloria, a vigorous and impressive movement. The setting of the Credo is dramatic in conception and contains the most elaborate part-writing in the work. The Sanctus is simply treated, but concludes with a fine climax. The Agnus Dei is pathetically expressive, and the conclusion unconventional. As a whole, this Mass in G is an excellent example of Gounod's most serious church style. It presents no difficulties beyond the abilities of average well-trained choirs, and is essentially appropriate for church use.

Recitation Music Series. No. 6. Curfew must not ring to-night. By R. H. Thorpe. No. 7. The Raven. By E. A. Poe. Music by Stanley Hawley. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

Since Schumann set Hebbel's poem "Schön Hedwig" and wrote to Van Bruyck in 1852, "I have not regularly set it to music, but made it more of a recitation with pianoforte accompaniment," and described the result as "a species of composition such as I don't think exists," musical accompaniment to spoken monologues has become common; but no one has achieved such perfect union in this form between the text and the music as Mr. Stanley Hawley. Thanks to Mr. Charles Fry the artistic merit of Mr. Hawley's settings have been brought into prominent notice, and the composer has been encouraged to continue the series. The two examples now reviewed are fully as successful as those which preceded them. In "The Raven," indeed, Mr. Hawley may be said to have surpassed his previous efforts. The recurrence of the verbal refrain, and the weird suggestiveness of the poem, naturally lend themselves to musical treatment, which in this case greatly adds to the impressiveness of the words. In "Curfew must not ring to-night" the composer has also used an associative motive with excellent effect, and the swinging and clanging of the fateful bell is illustrated in a most happy manner.

Jenny Lind: her Vocal Art and Cadenze. By W. S. Rockstro and Otto Goldschmidt. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This little volume consists of an essay by the late Mr. W. S. Rockstro on the vocal method of the famous Swedish songstress, twenty-six pages of examples in music type of the Cadenze, Solfeggi, and Songs (Scandinavian and Italian) sung by her at her performances, and a portrait taken from an engraving by William Holl. The bulk of the musical examples have already appeared in the work "Jenny Lind: the Artist," by the Rev. Canon Scott Holland and Mr. W. S. Rockstro, published in 1891; but students of singing will no doubt be glad to avail themselves of the opportunity now presented of possessing, in convenient and inexpensive form, these interesting illustrations of a style of art so little practised at the present day. Mr. Rockstro's description of the methods by which Jenny Lind developed and improved the voice with which Nature had endowed her, and overcame the difficulties that stood in her way, should be "read, marked, learned, and inwardly digested" by every young aspirant to vocal eminence, whatever may be the quality or compass of his or her voice. The lesson, if properly assimilated, may easily prove the foundation of many a successful career. Mr. Rockstro tells us that "Madame Lind's voice was not by nature a flexible one. The rich sustained tones of the soprano drammatico were far more congenial to it than the rapid execution which usually characterises the lighter class of soprano voices. But this she attained also by almost superhuman labour. Her perseverance was indefatigable." Most interesting and valuable are the accounts of her method of teaching the shake, her plan of breathing, and her perfect articulation of every syllable, whatever the language in which she happened to be singing.

Novello's Music Primers and Educational Series. Edited by Sir John Stainer and Dr. C. Hubert H. Parry. Fifty Three-Part Studies. By J. E. Vernham.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

All who teach sight-singing classes will welcome this series of vocal exercises in three parts, which admirably supply a distinct want. Part-singing not only rapidly increases independence and self-reliance in reading music, but it arouses and sustains the interest of the singer in a manner that in itself ensures satisfactory progress being made. In order to place these studies well within the compass of all voices, Mr. Vernham has confined his melodic range to an octave from C to C, and with a view of increasing their general utility has added under each stave the Tonic Sol-fa notation. Examples of all the difficulties of various intervals and rhythms commonly met with in choral music are given, and foot-notes supply many useful hints to the teacher.

Schoumka. Mazur. For Violin and Pianoforte. By Félix Borowski. [Laudy and Co.]

The first of these, dedicated to Lady Hallé, would make an effective piece for the concert-room, where, if played with expression and vivacity, it could scarcely fail to give pleasure. The "Mazur" is inscribed to Mr. Johannes Wolff, to whose style it is well suited and by whom we should like to hear it played.

The Pianoforte Sonata: its Origin and Development. By J. S. Shedlock, B.A. [Methuen and Co.]

With the exception of Dr. Parry's article in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," no attempt had been made in the English language to deal with the history of the sonata, exhibit its growth and the gradual evolution of its form, and classify the numerous examples available under the headings of names now recognised as typical, until Mr. Shedlock took the work in hand. Of his fitness for such a task no regular reader of The Musical Times will entertain the slightest doubt, Mr. Shedlock's articles in these columns having always been characterised by precisely the qualities needed for work of this kind—namely, care, accuracy, wide knowledge, conscientiousness, and a capacity for organising facts on the lines of modern scientific thought. His history of the sonata is a little masterpiece of condensation, while, on the other hand, nothing essential has been omitted. The volume is divided into eleven chapters. Of these the first is Introductory, and contains a short (so-called) "Sonata" for organ, by Bauchieri, published at Venice in 1611, in addition to much information concerning early instrumental writers—Legrenzi, Corelli, Becker, the Gabrielis, and others—and a description of several works in the smaller forms that show the sonata, so to speak, in embryo. This chapter is not only the longest, but one of the most valuable in the book, since not only does it lay bare the roots of the great art form, but it deals with works not generally accessible to students and, therefore, very little known. The remaining chapters are respectively headed "Johann Kuhnau," "Bernardo Pasquini, a contemporary of Kuhnau," "Emanuel Bach and some of his Contemporaries," "Haydn and Mozart," "Predecessors of Beethoven," "Ludwig van Beethoven," "Two Contemporaries of Beethoven" (i.e., Weber and Schubert), "Schumann, Chopin, Brahms, and Liszt," "The Sonata in England," and "Modern Sonatas, Duet Sonatas, Sonatinas, &c."

Berceuse. Slumber song. Words by David Bowen. Music by Madeline Hawtrey.

Impromptu. For the Violin with Pianoforte Accompaniment. By Arthur Le Jeune.

Versailles. Minuet in the old style for the Pianoforte. By Norfolk Megone.
[E. Ascherberg and Co.]

The "Berceuse" is a brief but tasteful little song, and it is not written in 6-8 time. The "Impromptu" is brightly conceived and neatly written. The accompaniment is effective. Mr. Megone's "Minuet" is a piquant specimen of this old dance form. It is easy to play and pleasant to hear.

Original Compositions for the Organ. Nos. 242 and 243.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The organist who takes in these pieces as they appear will certainly have an excellent and most varied repertory. The two numbers under review have been both composed by Mr. H. S. Irons, and respectively consist of a Reverie in C and a Romance in G. The former is a melodious and smoothly written piece, that the average organ player would find no difficulty in reading correctly at sight, and the latter is a graceful and expressive movement, which also presents no executive difficulties.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Altenburg.—Heinrich Hoffmann's new secular oratorio "Prometheus" was performed for the first time here on February 29 by the Sing-Akademie, under Herr Sitt's direction, and was very favourably received.

Bayreuth.—The sectional rehearsals for the "Nibelungen" performances in August next have been for some time in progress. The part of Brünnhilde, it has now been definitely arranged, will be confided to Madame Lilli Lehmann, who was one of the Rhine daughters in the original (1876) performance. She will probably alternate in the part with Madame Sucher. Madame Reuss-Belce, who attracted so much attention as Cassandra in the Carlsruhe performances of Berlioz's "La Prise de Troie," is to be the Sieglinde. Herr Brucks, the Munich baritone, is cast for the part of the hapless Wotan, Herr Breuer for that of Mime, and Herr Burgstaller (provisionally) for that of Siegfried, the two latter having been pupils at the Bayreuth Training School. The assumption by M. Jean de Reszke of the part of Siegfried is still doubtful; M. Van Dyck will not take part this year. Nearly all the tickets for the first cycle have been disposed of.

Berlin.—The one hundredth performance of Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" took place on February 24, at the Royal Opera, an unprecedented success here, where the work was first produced less than eighteen months ago. The composer, who was present, at the close of the performance was called into the royal box and decorated by the Emperor with the Order of the Crown.——A new ballet, entitled "Laurin," by Maurice Moszkowski, to which the late Emil Taubert had supplied the scenarium, was brought out at the Opera on February 29, and very well received. ——A new opera by the French composer, M. Urich, whose "Der Lotse" was brought out here some time since, has been accepted for performance at the Royal Opera. The work is entitled "Le Carillon," the German version of the libretto being by Herr Baeckers.——Rubinstein's "Christus," first produced under special conditions last year at Bremen, is to be performed here, it is said, during the summer, under the auspices of Dr. Löwe, the director of the Breslau Theatre, who assisted in the management at Bremen.

Bologna.—Madame Etelka Gerster, who has been residing here for some time past, will shortly remove to Berlin, where she intends establishing a vocal academy.

Breslau.—The Bohn'sche Gesang-Verein, which has been giving a series of highly interesting Historical Concerts lately, devoted its performances, on the 4th ult., to "Secular music in England during the reign of Queen Elizabeth." The programme included vocal numbers by John Dowland, Philipp Rosseter, William Byrd, Thomas Morley, Orlando Gibbons, Thomas Campion, John Wilbye, John Bull, Thomas Ravenscroft, and Michael Cavendish; and pianoforte (virginal) pieces from the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book. The performance was introduced by a Lecture given by Professor Bohn, the very able conductor of the Society.

Brussels.—M. Gevaërt, the distinguished director of the Conservatoire and successor of Fétis, will, on the 28th inst., celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of his appointment to a position which he occupies with so much honour to himself and advantage to Belgian musical art. The veteran artist is to be presented on the occasion, by the professors and pupils of the Institution, with a life-size bust of himself, the work of the sculptor De Lalaing.

Carlsruhe.—A new Mass, first performed here on the 2nd ult., under the direction of Herr Cornelius Rübner, and with the co-operation of leading members of the Hof-Theater, has attracted considerable attention both by its originality and deeply religious treatment. The composer is Herr T. Klose, a pupil of Anton Bruckner.

Cologne.—A complete representation of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" took place at the Stadt-Theater in the second week of March, with such success that it is to be repeated this month. Frau Prosky was a superb Brünnhilde. Professor Kleffel and Herr Mühldorfer were the conductors.

Dresden.—"Tristan und Isolde," which has not been heard here for some time, was given on the 2nd ult., and attracted a crowded house. Fräulein Therese Malten was the Isolde, Herr Gudehus the Tristan, and Herr Scheidemantel the Kurwenal—an excellent cast.

Florence.—A young Hungarian violinist, M. Louis Pécskai, has been causing quite a sensation lately in Italian concert-rooms by the display of what would appear to be most brilliant qualities. He is only sixteen years of age, and a pupil of the Conservatoire at Budapest, where, until recently, he studied under E. Hubay and David Popper. His reception here, as well as at Venice and Rome, has been marked by an enthusiasm which is echoed with equal unanimity in the press. M. Pécskai, after visiting Russia, will also make his appearance in England.——A new opera, "In Vendemmia" (In vintage-time), by the Maëstro Fornari, met with great success on its recent first performance at the Pagliano Theatre.

Gotha.—A new one-act opera, with the startling title "In Flammen" ("In Flames"), the libretto by Emil Strauss, the music by Max Marschalk, was brought out last month at the Court Theatre here. The new work, which is not devoid of originality, and is effective from a dramatic point of view, pleased greatly and is likely to make its way to other lyrical theatres of the Fatherland.

Hamburg.—A new opera, "Sjula," by Herr Carl von Kaskel, the libretto by Herr Axel Delmar, was brought out at the Stadt-Theater on February 29, and pleased greatly, the composer being recalled no less than a dozen times. A few days previously, Smetana's "Dalibor" (composed in 1867) met with its first performance here, under the direction of Herr Mahler, and achieved what is described in the press organs as a "sensational success."

Hanover.—Herr Ferdinand Hummel's new opera, "Mara," was produced at the Royal Opera, for the first time, on the 8th ult., and very favourably received.

Leipzig.—The jubilee of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was celebrated by an excellent performance of the oratorio, on February 24, at the Albert Hall here, by the Sing-Akademie, under the direction of Dr. Paul Klengel. The principal solo parts were in the hands of Frau Walter Choinanus (contralto), Fräulein Marie Berg (soprano), Herren Dierich (tenor) and Schelper (Elijah).——Doppler's new opera, "Much ado about Nothing," was brought out here on the 13th ult., and well received.

Liège.—The twelve hundredth anniversary of the founding of this town is to be celebrated with much pomp and circumstance in the coming summer. Music is to have its due share in the proceedings, including, inter alia, the performance of a festal cantata, "à Saint Lambert," written by the musical director of the Cathedral, M. Antoine.

Madrid.—The first of the Symphony Concerts, under the direction (by special invitation) of Herr Kogel, of Frankfort-on-Main, held at the Principe Alfonso Theatre, took place on the 2nd ult., and attracted a most enthusiastic audience. Amongst the numbers included in an excellent and representative programme, Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Préludes" was the most highly appreciated and had to be twice repeated. Certainly the taste in matters musical of Castilian audiences must have been undergoing some rapid evolutions of recent times.——At the Eslava Theatre a new one-act operetta, by Ruperto Chavé, "El Cortejo de la Irene," was brought out on February 28 with considerable success.

Maestricht.—A two days' International Musical Festival is to be held here, under the auspices of the musical society "Maestrichter Staar," during Whitsuntide.

Mayence.—Peter Cornelius's comic opera "Der Barbier von Bagdad," after making the round of German lyrical theatres, was at length produced in this, the composer's native town, on February 29. It was, however, somewhat coolly received.

Metz.—A commemorative tablet is to be placed here, at the house where the late Ambroise Thomas was born, and the street leading to it is to be re-named after him.

Münster.—A new Symphony in E minor, by Prince Reuss, was produced for the first time at the sixth Subscription Concert of the Musik-Verein last month, under Professor Grimm's direction, and met with general admiration. The work is described as perfect in form, masterly in its thematic development, and of great beauty in its orchestration. The Prince, who conducted his own work with great firmness and perspicuity, was the recipient of the heartiest applause.

Naples.—A performance of "Lohengrin" was given recently at the San Carlo Theatre, by Royal command. Signor Vignas and Madame Novelli having completed their engagement, Miss Florence Monteith alone remained of the original principals. On this occasion she appeared as Elsa for the fourteenth time this season, a fact which in itself constitutes a most marked success.

Pesaro.—The Rossini birth anniversary celebrations of the Liceo bearing his name were inaugurated on February 27 with a Concert at the Theatre, the somewhat peculiar programme of which included the master's Overtures to "La Cambiale di Matrimonio" and "William Tell," in association with Beethoven's "Eroica," a Largo by Handel, and the Overtures to "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser" (one is reminded, in this connection, of Rossini's dictum in regard to the latter: "Ci c'était de la musique, ce serait horrible"). On February 29, the anniversary proper, the master's "Messe Solennelle" was performed with an orchestra comprising fifty violins, twelve contrabasses, with the rest in proportion, and a chorus of 150 voices. Signor Mascagni conducted. In connection also with these celebrations, Signor Mascagni's new opera "Zanetto" was produced, for the first time, on the 2nd ult., at the Theatre of Pesaro. Its success was complete, spectators from all parts of the Peninsula being present, who bestowed "frenetic" plaudits upon the Maëstro and his new work. The latter, which occupies barely one hour in performance, and does not contain the accustomed intermezzo, commences with a chorus sung behind the scenes previous to the rising of the curtain, which, with other numbers, had to be repeated.

Pescia.—The centenary of the birth of Pacini is to be celebrated here, on the 12th inst., by special performances of his compositions.

Prague.—The Philharmonic Concerts, an institution founded by Herr Angelo Neumann, which during past seasons met with but a lukewarm reception, are proving a decided success this year, partly on account, it would seem, of the variety offered in its conductors. Both Herr Weingartner, of Berlin, and Herr Schuch, of Dresden, proved a great attraction, while Herr Nikisch, of Leipzig, who conducted last month, also drew full houses. The names of these artists are sufficient indication of the excellence of the programmes.

Rome.—With the commencement of the Carnival season the performances at the Argentina of "Walküre" and "Götterdämmerung" have come to a close. The former was given seventeen times consecutively, an experience without precedent here. Madame Adini, the successful Brünnhilde, has been engaged by Director Jahn to give three representations of the part, in German, at the Imperial Opera, Vienna.——Puccini's "La Bohème" was produced on February 23 at the Argentina with considerable success.——On the 14th ult. the first performance took place at the National Theatre of Signor Leoncavallo's early opera "Chatterton," the book of which is an adaptation of Alfred de Vigny's drama of that name. The work achieved a decided success, composer and interpreters being called before the curtain times out of number.

Stuttgart.—A new opera by Herr Krug-Waldsee, entitled "Astorre," met with good success on its first performance, February 25, at the Royal Opera. It is a work replete with dramatic verve and skilfully instrumented.

Tokio.—It is stated that the Emperor of Japan desires the establishment of a permanent Italian Opera here, and that steps have already been taken to engage an efficient company of Italian artists.

Verviers. — Henri Vieuxtemps, the great violinist and highly estimable artist, is to have a monument erected to him in this his native town. A committee has been formed for the purpose, and the subscription list is headed by MM. Gevaërt, Peter Benoit, Sarasate, Jenö Hubay, and other distinguished artists. Contributions, we are requested to state, should be sent to the treasurer, Professor Alfred Massau, 8, Rue d'Ensival, Verviers, Belgium.

Vienna. — Edvard Grieg, concerning whose state of health some disquieting rumours have been afloat recently, was definitely announced to give an Orchestral Concert here on the 24th ult., for the benefit of the Pension Fund of the Conservatorium. The programme, consisting entirely of compositions by the Norwegian master, comprised three orchestral numbers from "Sigurd Jorsalfar," the Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, Elegiac melodies for string orchestra, and the first "Peer Gynt" Suite.——Professor Carl Reinecke, of Leipzig, took part in one of the Philharmonic Society's Concerts last month, both as composer and pianist. In the latter capacity the veteran artist completely fascinated his audience by his interpretation of Mozart's so-called "Coronation" Concerto.——By the recent demolition of some adjoining property, the little inn in the suburb of Währing, "Zum Biersack" (name of its whilom proprietor), has acquired a more noticeable position. It was in the garden of this inn that Schubert, one Sunday afternoon in July, 1826, in the midst of the noise and clatter of the "Wirthschaft," wrote the melody of his immortal serenade, "Hark, hark, the lark." The inn has been re-named by its present proprietor "Zum Schubert-Garten," and the old chestnut tree is still shown under which the composer was wont to sit.——Goldmark's "Das Heimchen am Herd" ("The Cricket on the Hearth") was brought out at the Imperial Opera on the 21st ult., and proved an immense success. The work is in three acts, the libretto, founded upon Dickens's famous story, being extremely effective; and the entire presentation produced a most favourable and charming impression.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

Mr. A. R. Gaul's Ladies' Singing Class, in connection with the Midland Institute, gave an Invitation Concert. Contrary to custom there was no orchestra, and the accompaniments were rendered on the pianoforte by Mr. George Halliley. The principal work submitted consisted of Smart's melodious cantata "The Fishermaidens," the solo parts being taken by the Misses Long, Daniell, Davis, and Mesdames Wilfred Owen and Barwell. Through the courtesy of Mr. Gaul an opportunity was given to Mr. Osborne Edmundson, a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatorium, of making his début here as pianist. His best effort was Liszt's "Liebestraum," which received poetical treatment.

Messrs. Harrison's last Subscription Concert of the season was a brilliant affair. According to a long established custom our local entrepreneurs reserve their Orchestral Concert with the Hallé band for the last, which was their twenty-fourth annual visit. Mr. Frederic H. Cowen conducted, and at once asserted his position as a worthy successor of the late Sir Charles Hallé and a conductor of tact and judgment. He was given a most cordial reception, and every orchestral piece was followed by spontaneous and enthusiastic applause. The whole programme was a model of intrinsic worth and variety. Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture formed the opening piece, and the Symphony was Mr. Cowen's No. 4, "The Welsh." It was superbly played, and afforded the greatest delight to the large assembly. The other purely orchestral pieces were two excerpts from Delibes's ballet "Coppelia" and Mendelssohn's "Cornelius" March. Mr. Frederick Dawson gave an exceptionally fine and graphic interpretation of Tschaïkowsky's stupendous Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor (Op. 23). I had not heard the work since it was given under the composer's own direction in Moscow with the late Nicholas Rubinstein at the pianoforte—a performance that will ever remain engraven on my memory. The Concerto was a novelty here and was received with every sign of approval. Mr. Edward Lloyd and Miss Clara Butt were the vocalists, and Mr. John Lemmoné, the solo flautist.

Mr. Stockley's last Orchestral Concert of the present season proved a brilliant finale to his twenty-third annual season. He gave us for the first time here Brahms's Symphony (No. 4) in E minor (Op. 98). Tschaïkowsky's pathetic Elegie for strings (con sordini), which was most delicately treated by Mr. Stockley's orchestra, followed closely upon Wagner's "Meistersinger" Overture, the latter receiving a truly Wagnerian rendering. Madame Marie Duma, who was in excellent voice, sang with great fervour "Softly sighs," from "Der Freischütz"; also a song by Franco Leoni, entitled "Two Poets," and Becker's well-known song "Im Frühling." The well-known flautist, Mr. de Jong, contributed several solos with his accustomed artistic finish.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

The performance of Gounod's Trilogy "The Redemption," by the Bristol Choral Society, on the 14th ult., under the direction of Mr. Riseley, was perhaps the finest that has been given in our city. The magnificent choruses were sung with wonderful unity, precision, and refinement, the rich quality of the voices being particularly noticeable in "From Thy love as a Father" and "Lovely appear"; while the power of the choir was exemplified in "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," and "The Word is flesh become."

The soloists were Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Florence Cromey, Miss Clara Aldersley, Mr. Braxton Smith, Mr. W. Thomas, and Mr. J. F. Nash, who discharged their duties excellently.

At Miss Lock's Chamber Concert, on the 16th ult., Dvorák's Quintet in A (Op. 81) for pianoforte and strings, Mendelssohn's Quartet in E flat (No. 1, Op. 12) for strings, Bach's Chaconne for violin, and Mendelssohn's Andante with Variations (Op. 82) for pianoforte were the works played. Mr. H. D. Apperly was the vocalist.

Haydn's Quartet for strings (Op. 76, No. 1), Schumann's Quintet for pianoforte and strings (Op. 44), and Brahms's Sonata in G (Op. 78) for violin and pianoforte were the principal works in the programme of the popular Chamber Concert on the 21st ult.

Although this completes the brief record of the chief Concerts in our city, very important musical events have occurred. On the 14th ult. there was a brilliant gathering in Bristol of the members of the Western Section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, when they entertained the committee and conductor of the Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society, who recently sang before the Queen at Windsor, and presented to Mr. Riseley an illuminated address signed by the whole of the members of the Western Section.

Particulars relating to the Bristol Festival will be found in another column.

Yielding to representations from London, the Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society has decided to again give a Concert in town on the 24th inst.

The Thornbury Society of Gleemen gave an excellent Concert on February 18, when, also, a well deserved address and a silver-mounted bâton were presented to Mr. H. P. Thurston, the conductor. It is gratifying to note that a choral society has just been formed in the quiet Gloucestershire town. Mr. H. P. Thurston has accepted the post of conductor. Bennett's "May Queen" is in rehearsal.

MUSIC IN CAMBRIDGE.

The Concerts of the Lent Term included three of the Wednesday Popular Series. At the first, on January 22, Miss Fanny Davies was heard with Mr. Egerton in Brahms's Clarinet Sonata in E flat, and the same performers were joined by Mr. Kreuz in Mozart's Trio for pianoforte, clarinet, and viola. Miss Davies's solo was a selection from Schumann's "Kreisleriana." The Misses Salter were the vocalists, and gave several songs and duets in excellent style. At the second Concert, on February 5, the Gompertz Quartet gave a singularly fine performance of Brahms's A minor Quartet. Mendelssohn's E flat Quartet (Op. 44) was also in the programme, and Mr. Bispham gave Schubert's "Der Zwerg" and Schumann's "Der Harfner" in his usual consummate manner. The last of the series was postponed till the 11th ult., in consequence of Dr. Joachim's visit on the 27th ult. The orchestral pieces included the Overture to "Anacreon" and Beethoven's Symphony in F. A selection from Dr. Wood's beautiful music to "Iphigenia" was also given, two of the choruses being sung by as many of the original performers as were available. The composer conducted his work. Mrs. Hutchinson sang Mendelssohn's "Infelice" and Stanford's "Bower of Roses" with her usual charm.

The Guildhall has never been fuller, we had almost said, has never been so full, as it was on February 27, when Dr. Joachim paid his annual visit to Cambridge. He was accompanied by Miss Davies, Messrs. Elderhorst, A. Hobday, and Whitehouse. The performance of Brahms's Quintet in F minor was something to be remembered, and, in addition, we had an ideal rendering of Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 96). Dr. Joachim's solos were three Hungarian Dances. Miss Davies played solos by Chopin and Mendelssohn, and Miss Fillunger sang songs by Schubert and Volkslieder by Brahms. In each case the performances were beyond criticism. The presence of Dr. Joachim seems to have a stimulating effect on all with whom he associates, and we have never heard either of these artists to greater advantage.

The University Musical Society, on the 3rd ult., gave a performance of Handel's "Acis and Galatea." The band was composed of local performers, nearly all members of the Society. Mrs. Archbold, Mr. J. Reed, and Mr. Higley were excellent soloists, the choruses were capitally sung, and the performance of the work appeared to give much pleasure. At the same Concert Miss Alice Neville played Mozart's D minor Concerto for pianoforte in excellent style.

Dr. Mann's choir gave a Concert on the 2nd ult., consisting, for the most part, of unaccompanied vocal music. The chief pieces were Parry's "Blest Pair of Sirens" and Wesley's "In Exitu Israel," sung with all the excellence usually shown by this body of singers.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

Dvořák's "Spectre's Bride," with Stanford's "Revenge" and a miscellaneous third part made a very attractive programme for the Dublin Musical Society's second Subscription Concert, which took place at the Royal University Hall, Earlsfort Terrace, on February 27. The band deserves special mention for an admirable performance of the "Tannhäuser" Overture and a praiseworthy rendering of the difficult orchestral work of the cantata. The chorus of 325 voices also did its work well, and Madame Medora Henson, with Messrs. Herbert Grover and Wm. Paull were effective soloists. Dr. Joseph Smith conducted, Dr. Gater was organist, and Herr Werner leader of the strings.

On Monday afternoons the Chamber Music Recitals at the Royal Dublin Society, Leinster House, are in the greatest favour as a musical resort. On the 16th ult. the programme was made up of Haydn's Quartet in D major (Op. 50, No. 6), Beethoven's Sonata for pianoforte and violin (Op. 47), and Schumann's Trio in D minor for pianoforte and strings (Op. 63). Messrs. Papini, Darley, Grisard, Bast, and Esposito were the executants.

The Misses Elsner's Benefit Concert, which took place at the Antient Concert Rooms, on the 14th ult., was a most enjoyable one. Misses Pauline, Alex, and Ida Elsner were assisted by Miss Lucy Ashton Hackett, Mr. Melfort d'Alton, Mr. Gordon Cleather (vocalists), Herr Bast and Colonel Savage (violoncellists), and Herr Werner (violinist).

On St. Patrick's Night a Choral Concert of Irish music was given at the Rotunda, with a choir of 150 voices, trained by Dr. Annie Patterson, some of whose compositions were performed.

St. Patrick's Cathedral Past Choristers' Society announced a performance of Gounod's "Redemption," at the Leinster Hall, on the 24th ult., under the direction of Mr. Raymond Revelle; and the Dublin Musical Society an "extra" non-Subscription Concert on the 26th ult., being a jubilee performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," with Mr. Santley as principal vocalist.

MUSIC IN DUNDEE.

The musical season is now drawing to a close and the last of both Scottish Orchestral and Ballad Subscription Concerts have been given—the former on February 21 and the latter on the 6th ult. At the former, under the conductorship of Mr. Kes, there was an excellent as well as popular programme, which included Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, the "Tannhäuser" and "Hebrides" Overtures, Tschaïkowsky's "1812" Overture Solennelle, and Bach's Air for strings. Mrs. Fisk sang songs by Goring Thomas, Brahms, and Rubinstein with considerable dramatic force. It will be the greatest musical loss to Dundee should these Concerts cease from lack of necessary support.

The Dundee Society of Musicians held its sixth meeting on the 14th ult. This gave us an opportunity, unfortunately rare, of hearing wind chamber music. The works selected were Beethoven's Quintet (Op. 16), Larghetto and Rondo from Mozart's Quintet in E flat, and a Quintet in D minor by David Stephen (a local musician), which had a well merited success. The performers were Messrs. Sinclair (oboe), E. Green (clarinet), E Angless (horn), C. Borwick (bassoon), and D. Stephen (pianoforte). Miss Westwood was the vocalist.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

The third series of the interesting Historical Concerts which Professor Niecks has instituted in connection with the University Music Classes was brought to a close on the 5th ult., with a programme of chamber music. Four of the Concerts this season were devoted to the development of chamber music in Italy (Boccherini, Cherubini, Bazzini), France (Saint-Saëns, Gouvy, Widor), Germany (Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven), and among the Slavonic nations (Tschaïkowsky, Rubinstein, and Dvorák). Professor Niecks himself played first violin, and was assisted by Madame Agnes Hamilton, Mr. J. F. Guyer, and Mr. Carl D. Hamilton. Mr. William Townsend played the pianoforte part in two quintets. The first Concert's programme consisted of English glees, songs, and instrumental music; and the programme of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth century music at the fourth Concert was detailed in last month's Musical Times. Primarily for the benefit of the music classes, these Concerts are open to the public on payment of a small fee, and to a large section of the musical profession in the city by the courteous invitation of the Professor; and the markedly increased attendance this year, which also was steadily maintained, was very gratifying.

An interesting and very important event in connection with the Reid Chair of Music is to take place before the end of the session. The legacy left by the late Signor Bucher to establish a bursary for music students is now at the disposal of the Senatus, and will be competed for in June. By the will of Signor Theophile Bucher, his trustees were enjoined to pay over the residue of his estate, amounting to about £4,000, to the University, for the purpose of founding one or more scholarships in music to be held by any young men born in Scotland, who may show a natural talent for music and wish to make it their profession, for the purpose of improving their education, and enabling them to prosecute the study of the science and art of music in Italy, Germany, and France. The subjects of examination for the scholarship include Harmony, Rhythm, and Counterpoint, and the competition is open to young men between the ages of sixteen and twenty-five inclusively. The value shall not, after deducting the expenses of management and of examination, exceed £120 in any one year, the interest in excess of that sum to be added to the capital to form a second scholarship. It is tenable for three years, and may be extended to a period not exceeding two years, during which time the scholars must prosecute the study of the science and art of music in Italy, Germany, and France, as the Senatus, on the recommendation of the Faculty of Music, may determine. Mr. Franklin Peterson has been appointed by the University Court to act with Professor Niecks as additional examiner.

A very good audience greeted Herr Stavenhagen on February 28, when he gave his first Recital in Edinburgh, after an absence of five years.

On the 16th ult. the Edinburgh Choral Union offered the results of its study this year to a well-filled Music Hall. The programme was eminently catholic in scheme, embracing the healthy Paganism of the "Walpurgis Night," the operatic Christianity of Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and the touching, if sober and unassuming pathos of "Hear my Prayer." Mrs. Fanny Moody, Miss Clara Poole, Mr. Charles Manners and Mr. Child shared in the appreciation which the audience lavished on all the solo numbers. The chorus was in its best form. Mr. Collinson conducted with his usual care, and is again to be congratulated on the steady progress made by the chorus.

The Misses Currie, two Edinburgh ladies who studied and gained honours at the Royal Academy of Music, London, gave a Concert in the Freemasons' Hall on the 3rd ult.

At the fourth meeting of the Edinburgh Bach Society, on the 23rd ult., Mr. Leonard Borwick, Honorary Member of the Society, was present, and kindly contributed to the programme two Preludes and Fugues, the C minor Partita, and (with Mr. Colin McKenzie) the E major Violin and Pianoforte Sonata. The other numbers were the duets "Wann kommst du mein Heil," from "Wachet Auf" (Miss Guthrie and Mr. J. H. Kennedy; violin obbligato, Mr. Colin McKenzie), and "How blessed then are they," from "A Stronghold Sure" (Miss Mary Black and Mr. Gledhill).

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

As was generally expected, the directors of the Scottish Orchestra Company, Limited, recently issued an appeal to "musical Glasgow" for an increased measure of support. The situation is, undoubtedly, serious, and at the hour of writing these notes it is impossible to predict what is in store for us, more particularly as regards symphonic and kindred forms of the musical art. The Glasgow Choral Union has agreed to again co-operate with the Orchestra Company in carrying out a scheme of Concerts during next winter. Before, however, deciding to proceed with the necessary arrangements the public has been asked to indicate—in the form of subscriptions to the concert series—the amount of support which may be reckoned with. The proposed scheme would consist of fifteen Classical Concerts (twelve orchestral and three choral), to be given on Tuesday evenings during November and December next and January and February, 1897. The usual series of Popular Concerts would also take place on Saturday evenings, and the choral works might probably include Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Bach's Passion music (St. Matthew), Beethoven's Choral Symphony, and, for the first time in Britain, Mr. Willem Kes's cantata "The Diver." Mr. Kes has given a general indication of the orchestral works contemplated during the season, and these comprise Beethoven's nine Symphonies and five Pianoforte Concertos, Dvorák's Symphony, No. 5 ("From the New World"), Brahms's Symphony, No. 1, in C minor; Tschaïkowsky's Symphony, No. 6 ("Pathétique"), and German's new Suite in D minor (produced at the last Leeds Festival). The Wagnerian excerpts would include a complete concert presentation of Act 1 of "Die Walküre." Here, then, is an alluring prospectus, and the hope may be earnestly expressed that Glasgow will rise to the occasion right worthily.

Since writing the above we learn officially that the Directors of the Scottish Orchestra Company (Limited) have decided to carry on the Concerts next season.

Mr. Bernard Stavenhagen's friends here had not forgotten their favourite artist, as was shown by the very large audience drawn to the Queen's Rooms on the occasion of his Pianoforte Recital. The programme was replete with good things, and singular enthusiasm prevailed throughout the evening.

The Annual Concert by pupils of the Athenæum School of Music was announced for the evening of the 27th ult., too late for notice in our present issue. As usual the programme was drawn up in excellent taste, and included Rheinberger's "May Day" for ladies' voices, Bizet's Orchestral Suite "L'Arlesienne," Rode's Violin Concerto, No. 7, and Mendelssohn's G minor pianoforte Concerto.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The short season of opera, which terminated on the 21st ult., while it proved an unqualified success from a managerial point of view, has also been creditable in regard to its artistic aspect. The novelty of the season has been B. Godard's "La Vivandiere," a work which will probably have at least a fairly lengthy existence. Allied with a sufficiently interesting story of the Rhine Republic and La Vendée, there is ample scope for military display, and the whole of the scenic effects are, in fact, such as go a long way to ensure the success of any drama of the lyric order. But this is not all; for the music, while claiming to belong to no particular school, is decidedly clever, melodious, and well orchestrated. The first night's performance was naturally not perfection, but those which have followed have been all that could be desired. The conductor has been Mr. Claude Jaquinot.

The Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Gounod's "Redemption," on the 10th ult., in St. George's Hall, under Mr. D. O. Parry, with a band and chorus four hundred strong. On the 16th ult. the same oratorio was given at Liscard with good effect. A feature of this Concert was the excellent and unique performance of Miss Scott Burne, who not only sang Mary's song and the whole of the soprano music, but played the obbligati on the harp herself. At North Ferry, Mr. Pemberton has given Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm and Gounod's "St. Cecilia" Mass; at Birkenhead, Mr. Thomas has directed a capital performance of Haydn's "Creation"; at Widnes, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" has been rendered under Mr. J. Lewis, and the same work was announced at Runcorn for the 25th ult., under Mr. T. H. Crossley. Mr. W. Lee gave Cowen's "St. John's Eve," on the 20th ult., with the Mount Pleasant Choral Society.

The Sunday Society ended its latest session on the 16th ult., when the members at large and the orchestra individually presented testimonials to Mr. Argent, who has acted as honorary conductor during the ten years of the Society's existence. On the 16th ult. Mr. H. A. Branscombe was presented with a souvenir by ladies of the Philharmonic chorus, of which he has been master for twelve years.

The penultimate Concert of the Philharmonic Society, on the 3rd ult., again placed in evidence the personal popularity and excellent judgment of Mr. F. H. Cowen, the new conductor. The programme itself calls for no special comment beyond that conveyed in the remark that the performance of Mozart's Tenth Symphony in C proved a delightful sample of refined phrasing and delicacy of treatment. For the 24th ult. Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah" was announced.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

With the performance of Bach's greater "Passion" music the thirty-eighth season of the Hallé Concerts ended on the 12th ult., and a very eventful chapter in our musical history closed. In many ways has the last session been memorable. The duty of carrying through the plans sketched out roughly by the lamented founder of the Thursday evening Concerts was zealously undertaken; the bâton which Sir Charles Hallé so long wielded being, in turn, intrusted to several popular musicians, each willing to render such assistance as his engagements allowed; and so we have been afforded opportunities of judging the methods of various conductors of eminence, and of estimating the adequacy of their different readings of classical works. But wisely, and indeed necessarily, a permanent chief has now been chosen; and it is generally felt that, under Mr. Cowen's direction, the achievements of the orchestra which has done so much to develop, in the Northern and Midland counties, a love of art may not only retain, but, possibly, surpass that excellent discipline which has been gained by long serving under one guidance. Of course the absolute autocracy of the man who was not only conductor, but also proprietor of the Concerts, could not descend to Mr. Cowen; but the new chief may rely upon the loyalty of all serving under or associated with him.

The choir will still rehearse under the care of Mr. R. H. Wilson, and the advantage of the assistance at the organ of Mr. Fogg will not be lost. It is pleasant to be able to report that, in spite of a slight hesitancy in Dr. Stanford's beat in commencing some of the more fragmentary movements, the choir, in the performance of the "Passion" music, did much to atone for the very grave lack of interest exhibited in preparing M. Tinel's "Francis." Among the soloists, Mr. Andrew Black was truly admirable; and if Mr. Bispham left anything to be desired in his recitation of the words of the Saviour, it was only that a certain hardness of tone occasionally detracted from the general solemnity and sympathy of his utterance. Mr. Robert Kaufmann's discharge of the duty of the Narrator was a revelation; his phenomenal vocal resources, his clear enunciation, and his undeviating self-reliance combined to give a completeness of performance which led to a general and ardent desire to hear him in a part enabling us to judge more confidently of his ability equally to delight us in music of a more cantabile character. Miss Dolmetsch came to play the viol da gamba obbligati as, probably, no one else could play them; and Miss Fillunger and Madame Marian McKenzie undertook the soprano and contralto solos. Of the penultimate Concert the record must suffice that Dr. Joachim played the Violin Concerto in A minor (Op. 22) of Viotti and the very long Chaconne of Bach with exquisite finish; that the Symphony was that in F, whereby Goetz excited such glowing anticipations of pleasures to come—anticipations, alas! blighted by his untimely death—and that Miss Mabel Berrey confirmed, by the purity and excellence of her vocalisation, the hopes which, on a previous evening, she had kindled, and proved the impolicy, as well as the injustice, which so long excluded from these Concerts almost all native talent.

At Mr. G. W. Lane's fourth Concert, on the 7th ult., Mendelssohn's Psalm "Judge me, O God," bore evidence of the continuance of that improvement in the performance of the Philharmonic Choir which, from time to time, we have gladly noted as showing the zeal of the members and an earnest desire to fill what is a decided gap in our Musical organisation.

Mr. Speelman's series of fortnightly Saturday evening Concerts closed on the 14th ult., and it is feared that the loss upon the undertaking has not been trifling. On the 16th ult. Messrs. Harrison concluded their shorter season, when Mr. Edward Lloyd was very heartily welcomed on his re-appearance after his indisposition, and on the 18th ult. the concluding meeting of Dr. Watson's Vocal Society attracted a somewhat larger number of friends than usual.

On the 17th ult. a small meeting was held in the Lord Mayor's parlour, in the Town Hall, for the initiation of a movement for the founding of scholarships at the Royal College of Music here in memory of Sir Charles Hallé. It is hoped that a liberal response may result to the appeal which will be made to bring the advantages which the College offers within the reach of such students as have the greatest claim upon the public. The very enjoyable students' open practices are attracting the attention of the lovers of music; and in many ways the College is growing in importance as an art centre, but in none more delightfully than through the exquisitely finished performances of chamber music by the quartet party organised by the Principal, Mr. Brodsky.

The Jesmond Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Claud H. Hill, the organist of Jesmond Parish Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne, gave a Concert in the Parochial Hall, Jesmond, on February 18, the chief piece in the programme being Arthur Somervell's short cantata "The Power of Sound." The Society is small in number, but the performance was much appreciated by a large audience.

On the same date the Blaydon Polytechnic Choral Society gave a performance of Van Bree's cantata "St. Cecilia's Day," in the Church Schools, Blaydon, under the conductorship of Mr. James McCallum.

On the 10th ult. the Sunderland Philharmonic Society gave its final Concert of the season. The principal work performed was Mendelssohn's "Athalie," with Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Florence Christie, and Madame Belle Cole in the solo parts; and Miss Lilian Hovey as reciter. The performance was in every respect an adequate one and reflected credit upon all concerned. The principals could hardly have been more happily chosen, and Miss Hovey was particularly successful in her arduous task. Band and chorus also were excellent. At the same Concert a setting of the Psalm "By the waters of Babylon," by Mr. Nicholas Kilburn, the conductor of the Society, was performed with great success. The work is for chorus and orchestra throughout, and is effective and interesting without being too difficult. The performance was greatly appreciated, and at its close the composer was applauded with much enthusiasm. Mr. Kilburn conducted both works with his customary skill.

Perhaps the most interesting and successful Concert of its kind given in Newcastle for many years was that of the Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union (formerly the Gateshead Choral Society), which took place in the Town Hall on the 20th ult. The works performed were Dr. C. Hubert H. Parry's Oratorio "Job," Dr. Villiers Stanford's "Revenge," the Finale of Dr. Parry's "English" Symphony, the "Tannhäuser" Overture, and a couple of vocal pieces. "Job" had not previously been heard in the North of England, and much interest was centred in its production, the interest being considerably intensified by the fact that the composer had undertaken to conduct the performance himself. The work has been described and commented upon already in the columns of The Musical Times, and need not be further dealt with here; suffice it to say that the good impression it has created elsewhere was more than confirmed by a large and critical Newcastle audience. At the conclusion of the performance Dr. Parry received quite an ovation from the audience, in which the chorus heartily joined, his return to the platform to acknowledge the enthusiastic applause being insisted upon. The solo parts of the work were very successfully sung by Master Sterndale Bennett, Mr. Edward Branscombe, Mr. Emlyn Davies, and Mr. Andrew Black. A very excellent performance of Dr. Stanford's "Revenge" was also secured, under the conductorship of Mr. James M. Preston, the singing of the choir being beyond all praise. The chorus numbered about 400, and the band of the Manchester Orchestral Association, to the number of fifty, was engaged for the occasion. Great things are expected from this excellent Society in the future. The work announced for the first Concert of next season is Mendelssohn's "Elijah," the committee being guided in their selection of this work by the fact that this is the jubilee of its original production at Birmingham.

Other Concerts announced for last month, but taking place too late for notice in this number, are those of the Northumberland Orchestral Society, on the 23rd ult.; Dr. Rea's Amateur Vocal Society ("Martyr of Antioch"), on the 24th ult.; and the South Shields Choral Society, on the 25th ult. ("Elijah").

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

An admirable performance of Handel's "Samson" was given on the 17th ult. by the Chapeltown and District Sacred Harmonic Society. The musical development of Chapeltown has advanced rapidly since the formation of the Society in 1882. The conductor, Mr. Thomas Bool, is a zealous worker, and as a result the chorus-singing of the Society is worthy of the high reputation attained by the South Yorkshire choirs. The principals were Madame Conway, Miss Helena Sykes, Mr. T. H. Brearley, and Mr. Joseph Lycett. Mr. John Peck led the band, and Mr. Frank Senior was organist.

Mozart's Twelfth Mass was performed in the Albert Hall, Sheffield, on the 8th ult., by the St. Cecilia Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. William Brown. The Concert was one of a series of Sunday Sacred Concerts organised by Mr. Brown, who has for years been known as a regular and enterprising Concert manager.

Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm was performed in St. Mary's Church, Sheffield, on the 15th ult., the occasion being the annual Choir Festival. After the service Mr. J. A. Rodgers gave an Organ Recital.

The guarantee fund of the Sheffield Musical Society has now reached the sum of £4,000. The arrangements for the selection and organisation of the chorus are progressing satisfactorily, and it is anticipated that a very fine choir will be the outcome.

"The Golden Legend" was performed on the 19th ult. by the Barnsley St. Cecilia Society, under the direction of Mr. Alfred Benton, of Leeds. The band and chorus numbered 160 performers. The Concerts given by this flourishing and well-managed Society are always of a high class, and the rendering of Sullivan's beautiful work ranks among its best efforts. The principals were Miss Emily Davies, Mrs. Fisher Heath, Mr. Wright Beaumont, and Mr. Douglas Powell. The cantata was followed by a miscellaneous programme.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

Dr. Joachim's annual visit is always one of the pleasantest episodes of the Leeds season, and the Subscription Concert on the 11th ult. owed a good deal of its interest to his presence. Mozart's fine C major Quartet (No. 6) and Dvorák's Pianoforte Quintet were the main things in the programme, and were played with perfect sympathy and refinement by Dr. Joachim, Messrs. Rawdon Briggs, Gibson, and Whitehouse, with Miss Fanny Davies as pianist. On the 18th ult. a highly interesting performance of Handel's "Solomon" was given by the Leeds Philharmonic Society, when, as regards the scoring, it was determined that, for once in a way, Handel should be allowed to speak for himself. As "Solomon" is among the more fully orchestrated of the oratorios, and depends chiefly for its present-day interest upon the strength of its choruses, the result was entirely satisfactory. In the accompaniments to the recitativo secco a grand pianoforte was used with good effect, as also in "filling up" some of the airs. The soloists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Emma Wilby, and Messrs. W. Green and Billington; and Mr. Beyschlag conducted.

At the Messrs. Haddock's musical evening, on the 17th ult., Mr. Mark Hambourg made his first appearance in Leeds. Madame Amy Sherwin, Miss Ada Crossley, and Mr. Stockwell were the vocalists, Miss Brumleu played violin solos, and Mr. Lemmoné was flautist.

Bradford has been busy in musical matters. On February 22 the Bradford Permanent Orchestra, an institution whose permanence seems now to be pretty well assured, gave another of its Concerts. Mr. Frederick Dawson played Beethoven's great E flat Concerto with characteristic fire, while his phenomenal executive powers were shown in Liszt's "Don Juan" Fantasia. Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" and Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overtures were the chief purely orchestral pieces, and their performance reflected the highest possible credit on the taste and ability of the conductor, Mr. A. E. Bartle. The Society's last Concert for the season took place on the 14th ult., when Mr. Brodsky, who has just resigned the leadership of the Hallé orchestra, and is to be succeeded by Mr. Risegari in that capacity, played Spohr's Ninth Concerto with faultless taste and execution. It is satisfactory to know that Mr. Brodsky will, as Principal of the Manchester School of Music, remain in this country. Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, Massenet's "Scènes Pittoresques," and the Overture to Wagner's "Rienzi" were capitally played by the band. At the former of these Concerts Miss Teresa Blamy was the vocalist; at the other, Madame Lebrun. The Subscription Concerts at Bradford came to an end, on the 6th ult., with a good all-round performance of Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila," an opera that bears transplantation to the concert-room exceptionally well, on account of the character of the music as well as of the Scriptural plot. Madame Sandon was unequal to the part of the heroine; but Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Andrew Black, and David Bispham were excellent in the other characters. The choruses were capitally sung by the Bradford Festival Choral Society, and the qualities of the Hallé band were brought out to exceptional advantage by Mr. F. H. Cowen, its new conductor. On the 13th ult. the Bradford Old Choral Society gave a fairly successful performance of Handel's "Israel," under Mr. Hartwell Robertshaw's conductorship. The band, which consisted largely of amateurs, was rough, but the choruses were sung with vigour, and the soloists—among whom Mr. William Thornton, the bass, deserves mention—were efficient. On the 3rd ult., at the last of the Bradford Harmony Society's Concerts, Schubert's String Quartet (Op. 161) and Fibich's Pianoforte Quartet (Op. 11) were the chief things given, the performers being Messrs. Müller, Hudson, Gutfeld, and Giessing, with Mr. S. Oppenheim and Miss Dalgliesh as pianists and Miss Steger as vocalist. A Ballad Concert on the 9th calls for no comment, unless it be a word of praise for the refined performances of the violinist, Mr. John Saunders, and the pianist, Miss Isabel Hirschfeld.

At Huddersfield two of the most interesting Subscription Concerts of the series have to be chronicled. On February 25 Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch was responsible for a programme of old English music of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, from Henry VIII. to Purcell. Mrs. Dolmetsch as harpsichordist, Miss Dolmetsch as viol da gambist, with Madame Bertha Moore and Mr. Bispham as vocalists, entered into the spirit of the music most thoroughly; two quaint pastoral dialogues for two voices being sung with a delightful sense of their humour by the last-named artists. On the 10th ult. Mr. Willy Burmester's all-round powers as a violinist of the highest attainments were shown in a programme ranging from Beethoven down to Paganini. Mr. E. Hutcheson, as solo pianist, seemed to possess more dexterity than feeling, but may at least be described as a most competent player, and Miss Ada Crossley gave much pleasure by her refined and intelligent singing. On the 3rd ult. the Glee and Madrigal Society, under Mr. J. E. Ibeson, gave one of its agreeable Concerts of concerted vocal music, and, on the 13th ult., the Choral Society closed its season with the "Hymn of Praise" and "Acis and Galatea." Madame E. Thomas undertook, at a few hours' notice, the exacting soprano solo music, Miss Battye assisted in the popular duet, "I waited for the Lord," and Messrs. E. Lloyd and W. Riley were the other soloists. Mr. John Bowling was the conductor.

The Dewsbury Choral Society distinguished itself by an excellent performance of Dr. Parry's "Judith," on the 17th ult., in which Miss Agnes Nichols, Miss Sarah Berry, Messrs. Green and Price were the principals. The chorus singing was admirable, and the orchestra of more than average efficiency. Mr. G. H. Hirst conducted.

The Whitby Choral Society, under Mr. Hallgate's conductorship, gave a Concert on the 18th ult., the chief feature of which was Dr. C. H. H. Lloyd's cantata "Hero and Leander," of which a very creditable performance was given. The principals were Miss H. M. Stevenson and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail. During the interval a presentation was made to Mr. Hoggett, who, after a long honorary connection with the Society, has accepted a post as organist at an important Leeds church.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

Gluck's "Orphée," which had not been given since 1859, was revived at the Opéra Comique on the 6th ult., and the impression produced by that immortal work has been profound. The titular part, which some few amateurs can still remember to have heard interpreted by Madame Viardot, was sung by Mdlle. Delna. Some interesting details concerning the traditions which have been handed down for the interpretation of the opera are given by M. Tiersot in Le Ménestrel. Pending the revision of the score of Messager's "Le Chevalier d'Harmenthal," the directors have resumed the rehearsals of "La Femme de Claude," which will be brought out before long, and there is also talk of a revival of the "Calife de Bagdad," by Boieldieu.

At the Opéra, M. Duvernoy's "Hellé" is in active preparation.

At the Lamoureux Concert of February 23, a first performance was given of the second tableau of the first act of "Circé," an opera by Mr. Th. Dubois. The action is laid in Spain, during the war of 1809; a somewhat used-up subject, which failed to arouse much interest, as was also the case in regard to the music, although certainly the work of an earnest musician. Another novelty of this Concert was the "Schmiedelied" from the first act of "Siegfried," which proved a great success both for its interpreter, M. Lafarge, and for M. Lamoureux, who received quite an ovation. The Concert of the 8th ult. brought a first hearing of an Overture de Concert, by Louis Lacombe, a composer, deceased some few years, whom his contemporaries completely ignored while living. At the same Concert, Madame Roger-Miclos played a Pianoforte Concerto by M. Pierné. M. Pierné's work struck one as being scarcely serious enough in style for an audience accustomed to the austerities of musical compositions of the higher order. On the 15th ult. Handel's "Messiah" was performed by the forces commanded by M. Lamoureux, and produced a deep impression upon a crowded house, the soloists being Madame Jenny Passama, Madame Maurel, M. Auguez, and M. Lafarge. The work had not been heard here since 1873.

At M. Colonne's Concert of February 23 the performance of the second part of the third act of "Götterdämmerung" resulted in enthusiastic demonstrations in favour of the conductor and of Mdlle. Kutscherra, who sang the music allotted to Brünnhilde. The Concert of the 1st ult. presented a first hearing of "Les Landes," by M. Guy Ropartz, descriptive music of a distinctly modern type and interesting withal; superior in merit to anything we have so far become acquainted with from the pen of this composer, who is the director of the Conservatoire in Nancy. On the 8th ult. there was a complete performance here of the music of "Struensee," by Meyerbeer, some portions of M. Pierre Barbier's verses being recited by members of the Comédie Française. The latter appeared to us a somewhat superfluous commentary to Meyerbeer's expressive music, a mere indication of the various situations being all that was required. The Concert of the 15th ult. included, as a novelty, a poème lyrique, entitled "l'Epée d'Argantyr," by M. Gaston Carraud, suggested by a poem of Leconte de Lisle; rather an obscure and forced composition in parts, yet betraying a vigorous individuality.

At the Concert of the Palais d'Hiver, of February 23, Mr. Harold Bauer was the pianist and displayed his remarkable artistic qualities to the best advantage in the Concerto in G minor by Saint-Saëns, with which he won great and well-merited applause.

Amongst the numerous Concerts of chamber music and of individual artists may be instanced: Three Concerts of the excellent violoncellist Abbiate and the Concert (February 25) of the Society under direction of M. Nadaud, devoted to the Russian composers, Borodine, Glazounow, and others; the Historical Concerts of early musical compositions, which included "La musique pour les soupers du Roi de Lalande," 1657 to 1726, and the "Chant des oiseaux," of Jannequin, sung by the choir of Saint-Gervais (3rd ult.). The same Society included in its programme of the 17th ult. three madrigals by English composers of the sixteenth century—viz., Gibbons, Wilbye, and Morley. Again we notify, on February 28, a Concert given by Mr. Lederer, the distinguished solo violinist of the Lamoureux Concerts, with the co-operation of the pianist M. Falcke, which included a very satisfactory interpretation of the Trio (Op. 30) by M. René Lenormand and of a Sonata by M. Franck.

No decision has yet been arrived at with regard to the successor of the late Ambroise Thomas in the directorship of the Conservatoire.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Musical Americans are turning out well in support of Mr. Damrosch's company at the Academy of Music. The performances have been good—not better than many others which have been given before, and not especially noteworthy.

At date of writing, Mr. Damrosch's "The Scarlet Letter" has had a single presentation, which confirms the opinions passed upon it elsewhere than in New York, to the effect that the libretto is unwieldy and undramatic, and that the music, while at times striking and cleverly contrived, is remarkable for technical skill and ingenuity rather than for originality of invention.

The last visit of the Boston orchestra to New York served to introduce two new compositions, neither of which produced sufficient impression to make it worth while to repeat them soon. The first was Heinrich Zoellner's "Midnight at Sedan," and the second "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," by Richard Strauss.

At the last Concert of the Symphony Society, Mr. Rafael Joseffy re-appeared with Brahms's second Concerto, in which he scored a triumphant success. It is said that he has been working away at this composition during the years of his absence from the concert stage, and he certainly gave it a most finished and intellectual interpretation.

A ladies' string orchestra is the latest society fad in New York. One is in process of organisation, with Miss Jeanne Franko as first violin. It is said that the band is complete with the exception of the double-basses. "Lady Janes" seem to be scarce. This institution is likely to cut more of a figure in the social world than anywhere else.

The newly formed—perhaps "still unformed" would be a better term—guild of American organists has become involved in some difficulties from which it does not find the way out an easy one. It has been proposed to divide the active membership into two classes—fellows and founders. The fellows are, of course, to be subjected to practical and theoretical examination. So far, so good. The trouble is with the "founders." The invitations extended to join in organising the new guild included a number of organists who are active and successful in practical work, but who would find it difficult to pass the fellowship examination, if that examination should be very searching. In consideration of the efficient work which these gentlemen have done it is desired to give them an equal share with the fellows in the management of the guild's affairs, and to make the term "founder" as honourable as that of "fellow." Obviously, if this is to be carried out, the only safe plan for the guild is to limit the "founders" to a small number of men who occupy prominent and well-established positions. But quite a large number have already been admitted to the preliminary meetings, and there have been signs that they intend to have quite as much to say as the fellows. In fact, they are likely to rebel against being assigned to what seems to them an inferior place. On the other hand, it is equally plain that ultimately the test of active membership must rest upon scholarship only, and that the longer this is postponed by relaxing the conditions the farther off will be the time when the guild will assume such a position in the musical world as it ought to hold. How to get out of this difficulty is the problem which is just now taxing the ingenuity of the committee chosen to draw up a constitution and bye-laws. They have been wrestling with their task for some weeks, but have not made sufficient progress so far to warrant calling another meeting. There is also some apparent jealousy lest the New York men should secure more than their due share of the control of affairs. Altogether the situation is a pretty one, and it will take some dexterity to avoid pitfalls.

The United Polytechnics of London held their first annual Festival on the 21st ult., at the Goldsmiths' Institute, New Cross, "Elijah" being performed under the bâton of Dr. Frost. One of the objects of the promoters of the movement for yearly bringing together the members of the Metropolitan Polytechnics is to encourage the choirs already fairly efficient. The chorus and orchestra on this occasion numbered nearly 300, and the manner in which their respective duties were discharged afforded evidence of an enthusiasm that should be turned to good account by the study of standard oratorios. Precision and watchfulness marked their efforts throughout, and the majestic "Thanks be to God" and "Be not afraid" were very creditably rendered. The associated bodies were the Battersea, Borough, Regent Street and Woolwich Polytechnics, the City of London College, and the Goldsmiths' Institute. The principal soloists were Madame Medora Henson, Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Dan Price; and the second quartet consisted of Miss Serpell, Miss Helen Saunders, Mr. Wright Beaumont, and Mr. Ben Groves. Mr. Battison Haynes was at the organ.

The Pianoforte, Violin, and Song Recital of Miss Marie Olson, Miss Ethel Barns, and Mr. Charles Phillips, at St. James's Hall, on the 18th ult., served to introduce two novelties, the most important being Mr. William Wallace's setting for voice, violin, and pianoforte of Shelley's lines in "Prometheus Unbound," commencing "My soul is an enchanted boat." If scarcely so distinctive as some of this composer's efforts, the music very fairly reflects the spirit of the poem, and it was satisfactorily rendered by the three Concert-givers. The other new work was a graceful Berceuse, "Sleep, darling, sleep," composed by Miss Barns and sung with judgment by Mr. Phillips. Schumann's "Carnaval" and a couple of Liszt's pieces were skilfully played by Miss Olson, and Leclair's Sonata (No. 6) in G and an air by Bach agreeably manifested Miss Barns's command of the violin. The young artists gave an acceptable rendering of Beethoven's Duo Sonata (Op. 30, No. 3), and Mr. Phillips earned praise for the contrast of vigour and sentiment he displayed in Arne's "Vengeance, O come, inspire me," and Tschaïkowsky's "Serenade de Don Juan" respectively.

Time was when the South London Choral Association was generally recognised as the foremost of suburban choirs. Judging from the performance given by this body of "Israel in Egypt," on the 11th ult., we do not hesitate to say that it can still hold its own with the best. The singing of the choir from beginning to end was excellent, and rarely have the forces over which Mr. Leonard C. Venables holds sway been heard to greater advantage. The orchestra of the South London Institute of Music, under the leadership of Mr. T. E. Gatehouse, although largely composed of amateurs, played the accompaniments in a manner which was, on the whole, not unworthy of a professional band. The principals were Miss Edith Leslie, Madame Wilson-Osman, and Mr. James Gawthrop; Miss Julia Judge, a member of the chorus, joining Madame Wilson-Osman in the duet "The Lord is my strength"; and to Messrs. Knight and O'Shaughnessy, also choristers, was entrusted the duet "The Lord is a Man of War," in which they acquitted themselves well.

The fourteenth Stratford Musical Festival, representing the county of Essex and the East and North-East divisions of the metropolis, began on the 19th ult., in the local Town Hall. There were 384 entries for the various prizes during the four days' examination, being eleven less than last year; but, for the first time, the number of performers totalled over a thousand. Sixteen choirs of divers description entered against nine in 1895. In the elementary schools' choir contest, for choirs of not more than fifty voices, the prize, given by Mr. J. Spencer Curwen, was awarded to the Church Road, Leyton, Board School. In choirs of equal voices (not more than forty), the first place was taken by Forest Gate Collegiate School Choir (conductor, Mr. J. B. Gilbert), and the second by the St. Frideswide's Girls' Club, Poplar. Great interest was taken in the competitions, which included vocal and instrumental solos, trios, and composition. The brass and military bands contest will be held on August 15, in the grounds of the 3rd Essex Volunteers, adjoining West Ham Park.

After a good deal of uncertainty regarding the fate of the Bristol Musical Festival, owing to the difficulty of obtaining the necessary guarantee, the Committee have decided that it shall be held. Mr. George Riseley has been chosen conductor, and the following works are to be performed: "Elijah," Parry's "Job" and "Blest Pair of Sirens," Stanford's "Revenge," the "Creation," "The Golden Legend," "The Messiah," Gounod's "Requiem" (a posthumous work), "Hymn before Sunrise," a short choral piece from the pen of Mr. P. Napier Miles, a Bristol amateur of considerable culture, a scena by J. L. Roeckel, Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture, Beethoven's "Emperor" Pianoforte Concerto, a manuscript Overture by W. Macfarren, a Symphonic Poem by Sir A. C. Mackenzie, orchestral compositions by Edward German, Hamish MacCunn, and Arthur Somervell, a selection from Wagner's works, and an Organ Concerto by Dr. E. Prout.

At the Queen's Hall, on Saturday afternoon, the 7th ult., a Concert was given under the direction of Mr. G. H. Betjemann, who was associated with a large contingent of the choral and orchestral members of the Highbury Philharmonic Society, the programme consisting of Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" and a new cantata, "Sardanapalus," by Mr. Franco Leoni. The story of the dissolute Assyrian potentate has been carefully set for its present purpose by Mr. William Akerman, and the music is sensuous and melodious, as of course it should be, and is scored for a large orchestra. Decidedly "Sardanapalus" is a clever and effective work and Mr. Leoni, who has been steadily coming to the front, may be advised to go on and prosper. The general performance of both works was good, and due justice to the solo parts was rendered by several artists, the most prominent being Madame Marie Duma, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Richard Green.

In connection with the Guildhall School of Music a Concert was given, on the 18th ult., in the large hall of the City of London School on the Victoria Embankment. Several of the students who took part had already appeared in public, so that a certain measure of ability was guaranteed. Miss Jessie Huddleston, no stranger either to the concert-room or stage, missed none of the more telling points in the air "Far greater in his lowly state" ("La Reine de Saba"), and Mr. Samuel Masters gave adequate effect to Paston Cooper's "Ave Maria." Miss Marian Blinkhorn also won the right to special mention by her refined rendering of Walthew's "Gleaners' Slumber Song." A male quartet party did well in Hatton's "Absence" and Dr. Bridge's humorous piece "The Goslings." Misses Augusta J. Foster and Bessie Jones proved equal to Saint-Saëns's duet for two pianofortes, "Variations sur un thême de Beethoven."

The two middle numbers of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony in A opened the Concert, on the 4th ult., at the Imperial Institute. The detachment of movements from masterpieces is not to be commended, but Mr. Randegger, like a wise general, was doubtless anxious to avoid overtaxing the abilities of his forces. Other less exacting pieces in the programme were Mr. J. F. Barnett's pleasing "Liebeslied" and "Im Alten Style"; a second suite, "Airs de Ballet," by Gluck, arranged by F. A. Gevaert; the second and fifth movements from an orchestral suite by Gustav Blasser; and Cowen's charming gavotte "Yellow Jasmine." In the performance of these works Mr. Randegger's instrumentalists showed many excellent qualities, which further rehearsals will doubtless satisfactorily develop. Mr. David Bispham was the vocalist, and his finished singing was much appreciated by the large audience.

Mr. Daniel Mayer's Orchestral Concert, on the 3rd ult., at St. James's Hall, served to introduce to London an excellent soprano vocalist in Mdlle Jeanne Gréta, and also to increase the reputation of Mr. Mark Hambourg. The former has a voice of good quality and extensive compass, and the sound training it has received was shown in the interpretations of several operatic excerpts. Mr. Hambourg was heard in Chopin's Concerto in E minor, Schumann's Concerto in A minor (Op. 54), and in Liszt's first Hungarian Fantasia, arranged for pianoforte and orchestra. In all these works the young pianist displayed remarkable executive command of the keyboard, the climax being reached in Liszt's brilliant and showy music. The orchestra was skilfully conducted by Mr. Henry J. Wood, a feature of the evening being a very effective performance of Goldmark's picturesque overture "Sakuntala."

The Norwich Musical Festival will be held on October 6 and three following days, Mr. Randegger again occupying the position of conductor, when not replaced by composers who conduct their own works. Signor Mancinelli has promised a new cantata, entitled "Hero and Leander," Professor Villiers Stanford is writing a new choral ballad, and Sir Alexander Mackenzie will conduct his "Rose of Sharon." The following is the scheme:—Tuesday, Handel's "Jephtha"; Wednesday, Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Mancinelli's "Hero and Leander"; Thursday, Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," Randegger's "Fridolin"; Friday, Gounod's "Redemption," Stanford's Choral Ballad, and a selection from Wagner. The artists include Madame Albani, Miss Ella Russell, Mrs. Katharine Fisk, Miss Sarah Berry, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Watkin Mills, and Mr. Andrew Black.

Miss Silvia Rita gave a Chamber Concert on February 27, at St. James's Hall, of considerable artistic interest. The Concert-giver, who possesses a light soprano voice of pleasing quality, sang an excellent selection of high class songs in English and French, with taste and refined expression, being particularly successful in those of a meditative character. The other vocalists were Miss Ethel Bevans, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Kennerley Rumford, whose choice of songs was equally commendable and whose singing was much appreciated. The instrumentalists were Lady Hallé and Mr. Leonard Borwick, on whom it is unnecessary to comment save that their performances included Beethoven's Sonata for violin and pianoforte in G (Op. 30, No. 3).

That excellent singer Miss Rosa Leo gave Concerts at Steinway Hall on the 3rd, 10th, and 17th ult., the programmes of which were so interesting that they deserve notice in greater detail than, unfortunately, our space permits. She introduced a number of new vocal pieces by Bruneau, F. H. Cowen, Arthur Hervey, Amy Horrocks, Herbert Bedford, and others, in the interpretation of which she was assisted by Mr. David Bispham; instrumental pieces were contributed by Mr. Johannes Wolff, Mr. Sidney Brooks, Mr. Sapellnikoff, and Mr. Leonard Borwick, with customary success; and the accompaniments were played with rare sympathy and skill by Mr. Wilfred Bendall. Perhaps the most enjoyable feature of the three Concerts was Miss Leo's delivery of four of Bruneau's remarkable "Chansons à Danser," then heard in England for the first time.

The Welsh Festival at St. Paul's Cathedral, held on February 29, was, if possible, even more successful than either of its four predecessors. The vast building was filled in every part, and the congregation heartily joined in the hymns, the whole of the service being conducted in the Welsh language. With the exception of a short solo by Gounod, sung before the sermon by Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, the music used was by Welsh composers. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to a setting in D, by Owain Alaw, the anthem was specially composed for the occasion by Professor David Jenkins, of Aberystwith, and before the offertory Mr. Herbert Emlyn sang a solo from the pen of Mr. Emlyn Evans. The choir numbered about 350, and the sermon was preached by the Bishop of Swansea.

Miss Ethel Hirschbein, a youthful violinist, contributed to her Concert at Steinway Hall, on the 7th ult., the "Fantaisie Caprice" of Vieuxtemps, an Adagio and Canzonetta by Godard, a Berceuse by G. Fauré, and a Mazurka by Wieniawski. Taste and neatness were evident in her rendering of each, but as a whole the Berceuse was the best essay, breadth and freedom of style being in this instance combined with sustained feeling. Miss K. Augusta Davies, the pianist, brilliantly played a Polonaise by Paderewski and Godard's "Valse Chromatique," and Miss Adelaide Arnold was heard in harp solos. Miss Regina de Sales sang some florid airs with unflagging spirit, Mr. Charles Copland distinguished himself by a fervid rendering of Gounod's "O that we two were Maying," and other vocal assistance came from the Misses Salter.

Miss Marion Gordon and Miss Beatrice Pratt united their abilities as vocalist and violinist respectively at a Concert in the Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 17th ult. Miss Gordon, who was trained at the Royal Academy of Music, was heard in songs in contrasted styles; but her most satisfactory performance was an air from Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila," which she rendered with due regard for expression. Miss Beatrice Pratt, a student of the Brussels Conservatoire, played several pieces with a fair amount of fluency and taste. Mr. Charles Copland, who appeared in lieu of Mr. Hirwen Jones, gave with fervour and finish Miss Allitsen's "A song of thanksgiving," and further assistance was rendered by Miss Lillie Large, Madame Else Mathis, and Miss Kate Phillips.

At St. Peter's, Eaton Square, Dr. G. F. Huntley, the organist and choirmaster (late organist of Newcastle Cathedral), has marked the Lenten season by a series of excellent performances of specially suitable works. The efficient choir attached to the church was augmented both on February 26 and the 4th ult. for "The Redemption," and on the 11th and the 18th ult. for Bach's "Passion" (St. Matthew). In the last-named the solo parts were sustained by Messrs. George Pearce, James Leyland, Edward Iles, and Wiltshire. Rendered throughout with the utmost devotional feeling, this sublime setting of the Divine tragedy exercised its accustomed influence upon the congregation, who readily responded to the invitation to join in the impressive chorals. The energy and experience of Dr. Huntley will be usefully employed at St. Peter's.

The Grosvenor Choral Society gave its 288th monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, Buckingham Palace Road, on the 20th ult. Barnby's cantata "Rebekah" was performed, under the direction of Mr. David Woodhouse, the honorary conductor. The solos were capably rendered by Miss Florence Monk, Mr. James Gawthrop, and Mr. Sidney Jameson. An efficient orchestra, with Mr. Archibald Morgan at the pianoforte, accompanied the work. A short sacred miscellaneous selection followed. During the evening the Rev. Canon Fleming, the President of the Society, presented Mr. Woodhouse with a handsome cheque, the proceeds of a testimonial Concert given in the previous month in recognition of his valuable labours as honorary conductor of the Society.

The Westminster Orchestral Society gave a very successful Concert in the Westminster Town Hall, on Wednesday, the 11th ult. A rarely-played Clarinet Concerto in C minor, by Spohr (Op. 26), not very characteristic of the master, was, however, admirably played, as to the solo part, by Mr. Charles Draper. The Symphony was Mendelssohn's "Scotch," and other pieces were Weber's "Oberon" Overture, Barnby's Bridal March from "Rebekah" (played in memory of the lamented composer), and the charming orchestral idyl, "A summer day dream," by the Society's conductor, Mr. Stewart Macpherson. Miss Mabel Berrey was very artistic in some high-class songs, and the playing of the orchestra was perhaps better than on any previous occasion.

The Misses A. V. Mukle (pianoforte) and Frances Thomas (clarinet) at their Chamber Concert, on the 23rd ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall, had provided a programme all the more interesting because of the infrequent combination of the instruments represented. Rubinstein's Quintet (Op. 55) for flute, clarinet, bassoon, horn, and pianoforte; Lalo's "Aubade" for string and wind instruments; and even Brahms's Sonata for clarinet and pianoforte (No. 2, Op. 120) are not too often heard, and received at the hands of the Concert-givers and their associates an entirely satisfactory interpretation. A word of praise should be given to Miss May Mukle for her very clever execution of violoncello solos by Popper and Davidoff. Miss Saidee Kaiser was the much applauded vocalist.

Herr Franz Fischer, though armed with a recommendation from Herr Hermann Levi, failed to satisfy the more critical portion of the audience assembled in the Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 6th ult., to listen to a Wagner Recital on the pianoforte. To such a purpose the music of the Bayreuth master does not lend itself, besides which the selections, though played with abundant vigour, lacked the unity essential to perfect enjoyment of the works from which they were taken. The programme consisted of the Prelude to "Parsifal," the "Trauermarsch" from "Götterdämmerung," scenes from "Tristan und Isolde," the "Feuerzauber" from "Die Walküre," the closing scene from "Die Meistersinger," and the "Walkürenritt"

The Festival of the Three Choirs will be held this year at Worcester, on September 6, 8, 9, 10, and 11. Mr. Hugh Blair, organist of the Cathedral, has been appointed conductor. Besides "The Messiah" and the "Elijah," "Samson" and "St. Paul," the programme will include Bach's "Christmas" Oratorio, parts 1 and 2, Verdi's "Requiem," Goetz's 137th Psalm, Schubert's "Great is Jehovah," Spohr's "God, Thou art great," Blair's Advent Cantata, orchestral works by Beethoven, Schumann, Rubinstein, and Sullivan, and a new work, entitled "Lux Christi," composed for the occasion by Mr. Edward Elgar.

The dates for the North Staffordshire Festival are now fixed for October 29 and 30. The chief works to be performed are Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," Barnby's "The Lord is King," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," Beethoven's Choral Symphony, and a new work by Mr. Elgar. Miss Medora Henson, Madame Marie Hooton, and Miss Ella Russell; Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Frangcon-Davies, and Mr. Andrew Black will be the principal vocalists; with Mr. Willy Hess as leader, Dr. Swinnerton Heap, conductor, and Mr. Sherratt, accompanist.

The Army and Navy Auxiliary Stores Musical Club gave its fiftieth Concert on the 17th ult. The programme was miscellaneous, the principal feature being the cantata "St. Cecilia's Day" (Van Bree). The solo parts were very satisfactorily taken by Miss Kate Cherry and Mr. N. Wilfred Davey, and the orchestral accompaniments were creditably rendered by the club band, which also played the Overture "Poet and Peasant" in satisfactory manner. The conductors were Mr. J. Darch and Mr. C. E. Weekes.

The Vocal and Pianoforte Recital given by Miss Marie Busch and Madame Else Mathis, on the 4th ult, at the Queen's Hall, was, on the whole, artistically successful. Madame Mathis, who played several pianoforte pieces, the most important being Schumann's Carnaval, displayed considerable intelligence and technical facility; and Miss Busch was commendable in various Lieder by Schumann, Schubert, Jensen, and Rubinstein. Miss Gertrude Sichel joined her in an agreeable manner in duets by Brahms and Ernst Frank.

One of the best and most successful of our growing suburban choral associations is the Highbury Philharmonic Society, and on Tuesday evening, February 25, an excellent performance was given of that magnificent but far from easy work, Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," under the direction of Mr. G. H. Betjemann, with Miss Thudichum, Miss Sarah Berry, Miss Rose Dafforne, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint as the principal vocalists. After this Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" was, of course, comparatively speaking, child's play.

A new Concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra, by Mr. Tobias A. Matthay, was performed for the first time at the Crystal Palace Wednesday afternoon Concert of the 4th ult., and met with a very favourable reception. Miss Gertrude Peppercorn, who played it with remarkable power, artistic grip, and finish, is a most promising young artist at present a student of the Royal Academy of Music. She was enthusiastically recalled, both for her rendering of the effective new work and for some solos she played afterwards.

The Clapton Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," on the 18th ult., in Clapton Park Congregational Church. The orchestra (which has only been made permanent during the present season) and chorus comprised about 240 performers, and the principal vocalists were Miss Alice A. Symons, Madame Louise Lytton, Mr. Harry Stubbs, and Mr. W. H. Webb. The organist was Mr. Charles E. Smith, and the conductor, Mr. John Jeffreys.

The last Pianoforte Recital for the present, by that rapidly improving young artist, Mr. Mark Hambourg, took place at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon, when he played various pieces by such composers as Schumann, Bach, Tschaïkowsky, and Brahms, with splendid technique and sufficient expression—in fact, a surprising measure thereof, considering that some years must elapse before he arrives at man's estate.

Señor Antonio Guimaraes, a pianist, made a favourable impression at the Brinsmead Gallery, on the 12th ult., by his performance of works familiar to the majority of the audience. His execution was not remarkable, but in most cases he succeeded in catching the spirit of the compositions submitted. Miss Mabel Chaplin joined Señor Guimaraes in Grieg's Sonata (Op. 36) for pianoforte and violoncello.

In response to an application from Dr. Bridge, the Dean and Chapter of Westminster have created a new official post at the Abbey, that of "assistant-organist." Hitherto the duties of organist in Dr. Bridge's absence have been fulfilled by assistants provided by himself. At Dr. Bridge's recommendation the Dean and Chapter have elected to the new post Mr. W. G. Alcock, who has long acted as Dr. Bridge's private assistant.

The Eastern Division of the London Sunday School Choir gave an excellent Concert at the People's Palace, Mile End, on the 7th ult. The three branches of the choir were represented—viz., the prize choir of fifty, the adult choir of 160, and the children's choir of 150. The solo vocalists at this Concert were Miss Clara Dowle, Mr. Reaveley Long, and Mr. Charles Harmer. Mr. George Merritt ably conducted throughout.

Master Gladstone Bell, who gave a miscellaneous Concert on February 29, at the Queen's (Small) Hall, is a young violoncellist who, if carefully trained, and not forced to play in public, has apparently sufficient natural ability to enable him to ultimately achieve an honoured place in his art. The vocalists were Miss Louise Burns and the Schartau part-singers.

The biography of the late Sir Joseph Barnby has been entrusted to the hands of Mr. W. H. Sonley Johnstone, and will be published this year by Mr. W. Heinemann. Friends of the composer are invited to enter into communication with the editor at the offices of the publisher, 21, Bedford Street, and to forward any letters or reminiscences that may be useful in the compilation of the work.

The St. Andrew's Musical Society gave a successful performance of Gaul's cantata "The Holy City" at the Church Schools, Roupell Street, Lambeth, on the 3rd ult. The soloists were Miss Amy Mortimer, Miss Kate Limbert, Mr. A. Blair, and Mr. W. Seemer Betts. Messrs. F. Harold Hankins (pianoforte) and W. Barnes (organ) were efficient accompanists, and Mr. G. Graham Newstead conducted.

On the 14th ult. the choir of Downs Chapel, Clapton Park, presented to Mr. Charles Edwin Smith, who has just resigned the appointment of organist and choirmaster of the Chapel (which he has held for over sixteen years), a handsome armchair and music cabinet, each bearing a silver plate suitably inscribed.

The twenty-sixth of the monthly series of free Organ Recitals by Mr. Rudolf Loman, at the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, was given on the 19th ult. The programme included pieces by Widor, Gustav Merkel, Vivaldi, Guilmant, and A. G. Ritter.

Her Majesty the Queen and their Royal Highnesses the Princess Beatrice and the Duke of Connaught have been pleased to accept copies of Mr. George Miller's "Solemn March," which was composed for and performed at the funeral of the late Prince Henry of Battenberg.

Mr. Plunket Greene, having received offers of engagements from Germany for next season, will not be able to return to America until about the end of March, 1897, and will divide his time until then between Great Britain and the Continent.

On the 2nd ult. the past and present senior members of the Parish Church Choir, Gravesend, presented a splendid marble clock and an illuminated address to their organist and choirmaster, Mr. G. R. Ceiley, in recognition of his ability and zeal in conducting the services.

At All Saints', South Lambeth, on the 12th and 25th ult., Gounod's "Redemption" was performed with orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Walter Attersoll, organist and choirmaster of the church.

Mr. George Müller, late pupil of Dr. Joachim, has been appointed a Professor of the violin at the Guildhall School of Music.

A new Mass by Mr. T. H. Frewin will be produced at the Franciscan Church, Peckham, on Easter Sunday.

OBITUARY.

In Professor Carl Reinthaler, whose death, on February 13, was announced at Bremen, Germany has lost a gifted, conscientious, and highly popular composer, as well as an eminently practical musician. Born on October 16, 1822, in Erfurt, he became a pupil of the famous theorician, A. B. Marx, in Berlin, and subsequently continued his studies in Paris and Rome. In 1853 he was appointed to a professorship at the Cologne Conservatorium, a position which, eight years later, he exchanged for that of Cathedral organist and musical director in Bremen, from which he retired in 1890. During this period of over thirty years, the influence exercised by Reinthaler upon the musical life of the old Hansa town was of the most beneficial kind. He was the conductor of the Sing-Akademie, founded in 1815 by Riem, and of the Liedertafel, which he raised to a position of eminence in Northern Germany; while in his organisation and directorship of a concert institution, founded on the model of the Leipzig Gewandhaus, his excellent business qualities stood him in good stead. His compositions are distinguished by thorough musicianlike workmanship, natural sentiment, and a delicate sense of formal beauty and harmonic effects. They include the operas "Edda" and "Käthchen von Heilbronn," which latter made the round of the German lyrical theatres; the successful and frequently produced oratorio "Jephtha"; the 90th Psalm, for double chorus; several symphonies, cantatas, and other choral works, besides numerous songs. His "Bismarck Hymn," which obtained the prize in a competition some years since, has been immensely popular in Germany. Some of his cantatas and chamber works have also been performed in this country.

The most distinguished and successful of Scandinavian vocal teachers, Fritz Arlberg, died in Christiania on February 21, at the age of sixty-six. A native of Sweden, he studied the law at the University of Upsala, but, being in the possession of an excellent tenor voice, was drawn to the lyrical stage, where he quickly achieved great popularity both at the Royal Theatre, Stockholm, and in artistic tours on the Continent. From 1874 to 1877 he was engaged at the Opera in Christiania, after which he established himself as a teacher. In this latter capacity he has for the last twenty years rendered eminent service to the art, he being the most highly valued vocal professor in Christiania, as well as in the Danish capital. Arlberg was also the composer of a number of songs, some of them very happily inspired, and one of the best Swedish translators of operatic librettos, his versions of "Der fliegende Holländer," "Orphée," and "Faust" being, indeed, masterpieces of their kind. The deceased was married to Mdlle. Maria Néruda, a sister of Lady Hallé.

The death is announced, recently, at Paris, of Adolphe de Groot, musical director and composer. He was a native of Holland, and for a number of years occupied the post of conductor at the theatres of the Châtelet and of the Porte Saint-Martin, in Paris. He wrote the incidental music to many of the dramas brought out at the last-named establishment, some of these compositions enjoying an immense popularity at the time, notably those associated with "Le Nid de Fauvette," which still retain their popularity. He was also the successful composer of pianoforte and violin pieces, and of several string quartets and trios. The deceased was in his seventy-seventh year.

François Nautet, an able musical critic and author, died last month at Brussels. He was the founder, some twenty years since, of a musical journal, Do, Mi, Sol, which met with a fair measure of success, and the critic for a number of years of the Journal de Bruxelles and Indépendence Belge, he being also a contributor to our esteemed contemporary Le Guide Musical. Among his published works are three volumes of critical essays, entitled "Histoire des Lettres Belges."

Aloys Berla, a Viennese dramatic author, extremely popular in the sixties and seventies, died in the Austrian capital, of which he was a native, on February 17. He commenced his career as an operatic singer, and, turning his attention to literature, became a most prolific writer of dramas, comedies, &c., to the number of considerably over one hundred. These also include the books of several operettas, which he wrote for Millöcker and other Viennese composers. Berla, whose real name was Scheichl, was in his seventieth year.

The death is announced, on the 20th ult., at Raudnitz (Bohemia), of Dr. Carl Teige, professor at the Grammar School in that town, and a much esteemed musical author. His specialty was the study of the works of Smetana, and his thematic and critical catalogue of the latter's compositions is a standard work on the subject. He had latterly been engaged upon an exhaustive biography of the Bohemian master, which remains incomplete.

We have also to record the death, last month, in California, at the age of seventy-four, of Mr. Allen Dodworth, a musician well known throughout America as conductor of the famous Dodworth band. He was an Englishman, but his father, Thomas Dodworth, of Sheffield, emigrated to America seventy years ago, and founded the band which bears the family name. Dodworth Hall, which was built by Mr. Allen Dodworth in the early fifties, was for many years the principal concert-room of New York.

Jules Joseph Ernest Vieuxtemps, the much esteemed violoncellist, died suddenly of apoplexy in the streets of Belfast, on the 20th ult. He was the younger brother of the celebrated violinist, Henri Vieuxtemps, and was born in Brussels on March 13, 1832. He studied at the Brussels Conservatoire, and some quarter of a century ago came to London as a member of the Italian Opera orchestra, under the late Sir Michael Costa. Some years since he entered the orchestra of Sir Charles Hallé as leading violoncellist, and took up his residence in Manchester.

We have also to record the following deaths:—

On February 10, at Gotha, Prince Egon von Ratibon, chief artistic director of the Court Theatre.

On February 11, at Leipzig, Friedrich Kessner, solo clarinettist of the Gewandhaus Orchestra, aged thirty-seven.

On February 12, at Dresden, Carl Burchard, composer and noted author of pianoforte arrangements of German classics, aged seventy-six.

On February 14, at Vienna, Prince Constantin Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst, chief Intendant of the Imperial Opera, aged sixty-seven.

Recently, at Naples, Giuseppe Milano, pianist, teacher at the Blind Institute of San Giuseppe e Lucia, aged sixty-nine.

Recently, at Paris, Mdlle. Marie de Pierpont, esteemed composer and organist.

On February 18, at Naples, Guiseppe Palumbo, composer of church music, conductor and teacher, aged eighty.

Recently, at Saint Cloud, Alfred Turban, first violinist at the Opéra, professor at the Conservatoire, a native of Strassburg.

On February 20, at Oldenburg, Freiherr von Wangenheim, general Intendant of the Grand-Ducal Theatre.

On February 20, at Vernon Chambers, Emma Wright Mundella, eldest daughter of the late John Mundella, of Nottingham.

On February 23, at Brussels, Alfred Blau, librettist and musical critic of Paris, author of the books of "Sigurd" and "Esclarmonde," a chevalier of the Legion of Honour.

On the 5th ult., at Chaumont, Charles Alwens, pianist and pianoforte teacher, Officier de l'Académie, a native of Bavaria, aged seventy-two.

On the 4th ult., at Bern, Adolph Reichel, composer, conductor of the Cecilia Choral Society, aged eighty.

On the 6th ult., at Dresden, Frau Lina Ballard-Dittmarsch, pianist.

Recently, at Zurich, F. Grosser, musical director, violinist of the Tonhalle Society orchestra.

On the 11th ult., at Sondershausen, Alfred Martin, distinguished violoncellist, for some years of Helsingfors, at the early age of twenty-six.

THE NEW AMERICAN COPYRIGHT BILL.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Having by your courtesy been allowed to see an article on the New American Copyright Bill, by Mr. E. Cutler, Q.C., which will, I understand, appear in another part of your April number, I should like to add a few remarks to emphasise the probable effect of the Bill on the International side of the question. Since the decision of the American Appeal Court, in the action Novello and Co. v. The Oliver Ditson Company, the scope of the present American copyright law has been very clearly understood, and its quasi-international character has proved beneficial, not only to those foreign countries which have become, by virtue of the President's proclamations, entitled to claim its protection, but also to the Americans themselves. It should, however, be clearly understood that the Act of 1891 was not an international Act. There were no contracting nations. The American people saw the necessity of taking a broader view of the whole question of copyright, and they thereupon altered their own domestic law so as to give practical effect to that view. Prior to July 1, 1891, American copyright was limited to "any citizen of the United States or resident therein." Since the Act of 1891 came into force, protection was also afforded to certain foreign nations; not to all foreign nations, but only to those nations which, like England, already permitted, or, like Germany, might afterwards permit to Americans the benefit of copyright on substantially the same basis as to their own citizens. The American Government has recently seen the necessity of amending its copyright law (amongst other reasons for the purpose of robbing those interested in musical compositions of the fruit of the victory achieved in their favour by the Novello action), and a new Copyright Bill, now before the American House of Representatives, provides that music, like books, must be manufactured in America as a condition of being copyrighted there.

As the proposed law is not an international compact, Englishmen have no locus standi to protest; they can only observe and wonder. But it is useful to point out a consequence of the proposed new legislation which will no doubt astonish the Americans no less than it will amuse the rest of the world. The new Bill is replete with doubts and ambiguities, not to say absurdities; but the author of the Bill probably never foresaw what would be the consequence of one of its inconsistencies. Section 8 clearly extends the benefits of its provisions to the whole world, Hottentots included. On the other hand, sections 13, 17, 18, and 24 almost as clearly limit its scope to American citizens, and the proviso of section 21, by including foreign authors in an exception, appears to exclude them from the general law. Again, certain words in the existing Act of 1891, dealing with the foreign element, are omitted from the present Bill. The rights of foreigners under this Bill are thus in a state of delightful doubt. But this much is certain—they are all included or they are all excluded. There is no middle course. It is no longer a question of some foreigners; it is all or none, as may be hereafter decided by the American Courts of Justice. Now "all" (new Bill) or "none" (new Bill) are clearly inconsistent with "some" (section 13, Act 1891). Consequently, by section 36 of the new Bill, section 13 of the present Act is repealed, and with the repeal of section 13 there will be an end to all the President's proclamations. The new Bill does not entitle the President to proclaim anything, yet it takes away his present powers of proclaiming! This Bill, therefore, if it becomes law, must be interpreted as it stands. The reciprocity test is abandoned. Copyright for the future is to be open to the whole world or to Americans alone. In the latter view America is retrograde with a vengeance; while if the former is the correct interpretation, America is so terribly up to date as to go far beyond anything required by the Berne Convention. In a very short time there will be a meeting of the Berne Convention in Paris. Why does not America, with a stroke of the pen, cut out her manufacturing stipulations and, by joining the Berne Convention, take up her true position as regards copyright?

Your obedient Servant,

Henry R. Clayton.

March 23, 1896.

These artists also contributed several songs in the second part of the evening, during which the choir sang Faning's choral ballad "The miller's wooing," Bishop's glees "Spirits, advance," and "Blow, gentle gales," and the orchestra played two overtures and Sullivan's "Graceful Dance" from the incidental music to "Henry VIII." Mr. W. Clafton was principal violin and Mr. James F. Slater conducted.

Oxford.—An overflowing congregation assembled in the Cathedral on the 16th ult., when Bach's "Passion Music" according to St. Matthew was sung, under the conductorship of Dr. Lloyd, with Mr. Basil Harwood at the organ. The Cathedral choir was augmented by members of the choirs of Magdalen, New College, and Eton. On future occasions it is to be hoped the congregation will be invited to join in singing the chorals. ——Sir John Stainer's Lecture on early church music, delivered on the 11th ult., in the Sheldonian Theatre, was of the valuable and comprehensive nature which habitually characterises the papers of this distinguished musician. The lecturer dealt, in particular, with Christopher Tye and his two settings of the Mass, probably written between 1536 and 1545, concerning which much rare and interesting information was given.

Rhyl.—A performance of "The Messiah" was given at the Grand Pavilion, on the 10th ult., by the Choral Society. The soloists were Madame Laura Smart, Miss Alice Whittaker, Mr. Ben Roberts, and Mr. James Wilkinson. Mr. H. Haselden was principal violin and Mr. C. Sydney Vinning conducted.

Richmond.—The Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. James Brown, gave its second Concert of the present season on the 17th ult., at the Star and Garter. A feature of the evening was the performance of a setting for solo voice and orchestra, by the conductor of the Society, of Matthew Arnold's "Requiescat." Other works in the programme were Mackenzie's cantata "The Bride" and Alice Mary Smith's "Ode to the North-East Wind." The vocalists were Miss Neile Matthews and Mr. Haysman. Violoncello pieces were contributed by Mr. T. Werge, and several orchestral works were admirably played by the band.

Runcorn.—The Tonic Sol-fa Choir gave, on the 11th ult., a performance of Handel's "Joshua," with Prout's additional accompaniments, in the Public Hall. Madame Goodall, Miss M. Cullis, Mr. T. Child, and Mr. A. S. Kinnell were the principal vocalists. Mr. W. Cooke presided at the organ, Mr. J. W. Collinson was leader of the band, and Mr. John Holford, conductor.

St. Albans.—The Oratorio Society, under the experienced direction of Mr. W. H. Speer, gave a performance of "The Messiah," on the 19th ult., in the County Hall. The soloists engaged were Miss J. Scott, Miss K. Longland, Mr. E. Branscombe, and Mr. W. Tew. Miss D. Etheridge was principal violin, and Mr. G. Rose rendered helpful service at the harmonium.

Surbiton, Surrey.—An effective performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" was given on the 23rd ult., in the Assembly Rooms, by the Choral Society, under the able conductorship of Mr. R. Sebastian Hart. The solos were sung by Madame A. Patterson, Miss Bessie Grant, Mr. S. Masters, and Mr. J. L. Haddon; and the choruses and orchestral portions were rendered by about 150 performers. Mrs. Seaman presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. J. W. Rendle was principal violin.

THE DISCOVERY OF THE HUMAN VOICE—AT LAST!!!

VOXOMETRIC REVELATION.

This is, undoubtedly, the most wonderful work of the kind ever put before the public.

Reveals some fairly astounding facts concerning the Human Voice.

Completely breaks up, and conclusively disproves, all other existing so-called theories on the production and training of the Voice.

Absolutely proves every other writer on this question to have entirely misunderstood his subject; as, each and all have always attempted to build a theory on a wrong basis.

Finally precludes the possibility of any further erroneous contributions to the mass of incoherent literature, on this subject, hereafter appearing.

Because a thoroughly tangible, consistent, and eminently scientific—yet truly natural—theory is supplied.

Decisively answers every point hitherto in constant dispute on this notoriously vexed question.

Diametrically opposed to the teaching advanced by every other writer; and, in strong contrast to these, supplying, for the first time, a consistent, definite, and tangible theory.

Disclosing facts which furnish a doctrine that will unquestionably henceforth place this work in the position of recognised Standard Authority on Voice Production, both in Song and Speech.

The first Work to disclose what the Human Voice really is. For the first time revealing its source and origin.

The discoveries made by the Author are the outcome of nearly twenty-five years' exhaustive study devoted to scientific research.

Singing is proved no more "a gift" than that of sight, hearing, or any of the other senses.

Besides the purely technical matter on the Science of Speech and Song contained in this Work, reference is made, in the most unmistakable manner, to a subject of even more vital interest still; and, lurking in the forcible language in which this volume is clothed, there is undeniable evidence of a deeper scientific knowledge underlying all that is therein disclosed, which will not only carry conviction to the minds of the most sceptical as to the incontrovertible nature of the contentions now made, but must also arouse intense interest in the minds of all intellectual people to learn further the solution of still more engrossing scientific problems, evidently to be revealed from the same source.

Every statement advanced in "Voxometric Revelation" is supported by an overwhelming flood of proof as to its accuracy; and the entire Work is nothing short of a wonderful revelation on a subject of world-wide interest hitherto entirely misunderstood, and must prove of acute interest and direct benefit to any intelligent person not deaf or dumb.

It is impossible to convey an adequate idea of the merits of this production within the limits of an advertisement.

No one, who is the least interested in Vocal matters, can afford to be without a copy of this Work!

NOTE.—The custom which prevails in schools of allowing pupils to play in unison, to the practical exclusion of part-playing, has suggested the need of such pieces as are contained in these volumes; and it is hoped that, besides providing for the want that is felt, they will also tend to modify the custom.—GEORGE CALKIN.

OPERETTAS AND CANTATAS.

YE OLDE ENGLYSHE PASTYMES

By Rev. F. W. GALPIN.

"The Rev. F. W. Galpin's skilful arrangement of 'Olde Englyshe Pastymes,' with its careful directions as to their performance, should be as successful in London as in the country, where the entertainment was first given. The music, mostly chosen from old sources and put together with real artistic ability, has an additional value as a collection of beautiful examples of English dances and songs."—The Times.

THE GRENADIER CAP

SHAPCOTT WENSLEY. ARTHUR SOMERVELL.

"Mr. Arthur Somervell's 'Enchanted Palace' is an exceedingly pretty treatment in easy operatic form of the Sleeping Beauty story; there is plenty of fun in it, the libretto by Shapcott Wensley provides speaking as well as singing parts, and the whole is as graceful an entertainment for the purpose as could be imagined. The Princess's last song has a deeper expression than the rest of the little work, and both it and the lovely waltz deserve to be heard apart from the piece as a whole."—The Times.

Tonic Sol-fa, 8d.

SHAPCOTT WENSLEY. J. L. ROECKEL.

"In 'The Hours,' a cantata for female voices, by J. L. Roeckel, Mr. Shapcott Wensley has written a graceful little allegory, and collaborated with the composer of the melodious and dramatic music in producing a refined and charming work. The properties and scenes are easily attainable, and the number of the dramatis personæ may be readily increased by lengthening the series of 'The Hours.'"—Educational Times.

Highly recommended by SIR JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Oxon.; C. H. H. PARRY, Mus. Doc., Oxon. et Cantab.; JOSEPH BRIDGE, M.A., Mus. Doc., &c., and many other leading Musicians.

MASTER BENNETT is exceptionally gifted (he can sing a shake with ease) and has an extensive répertoire.

Mr. BLAXLAND recommends as a novelty for Concerts, Banquets &c., his whose répertoire consists of Trios, Duets, and Solos.

RECENT NOTICES.—"The 'Boys' Trio' made their first appearance in Scotland, and fairly captivated the audience. The principal was Master Bennett, who possesses quite a phenomenal voice. His method is simply perfect, and he sings with an intelligence and an artistic finish which one very rarely hears on the concert platform. His rendering of 'I know that my Redeemer' surpassed anything we have ever heard. In 'Sing, sweet bird' (Ganz), the flexibility and the wonderful range of his voice were alike marvellous, finishing, as he did, on the C above the stave with ringing clearness, and that with a piano above concert pitch. The other boys, Master Parry and Master Ménage, both possess rare voices, which they manage with consummate art."—The Cumnock News, April 3, 1896.

"A novelty and a very great attraction was found in Mr. Blaxland's 'Boys' Trio.' They sang solos, duets, and trios with fine expression and effect. . . . a good testimony to their fine training. Master Bennett's solos . . . will linger long in our memory. Masters Parry and Ménage in all their appearances had the most enthusiastic approval of the audience."—The Cumnock Express, April 3, 1896.

"It is clear that Mr. Macdonald Smith has studied the subject carefully, and acts upon well-ascertained scientific grounds."—Daily Telegraph.

"The great, the supreme merit of Mr. Smith's system consists in the fact that it involves the total abolition and disestablishment of all that terrible scale practising and five-finger exercising."—Westminster Gazette, November 20, 1895.

"We make no comparisons, but say simply, from personal experience, that Mr. Smith's system of training does all that he claims for it. . . . THE CONCERT HALL of the LIEDERKRANZ, in Stuttgart, one of the largest in Germany, was provided last year for its Musical Festivals with a new organ, which, according to the judgment of all experts, has turned out to be a masterpiece of organ-building. It has 4 manuals, 54 speaking stops, and contains several improvements of greatest importance. The said organ is constructed throughout on Mr. Weigle's purely pneumatic system—namely, membrane wind chests, acted upon by pneumatic tube traction and an exclusively pneumatic keyboard. Though the pneumatic tubes are less than ½-inch wide, the quick answering of every note is surprising. An equally important invention of Mr. Weigle is his high-pressure labial pipes. Of the 54 speaking registers of the Liederkranz organ 8 are provided with high pressure of 12-inch power, and these 8 registers, together with the other 46 of normal wind pressure, produce a volume of sound equal to about 140 ordinary registers. The shape of these high-pressure pipes is protected by English patent. All Organ Builders wishing for a more detailed description and designs of this highly interesting organ should apply to the Inventor, Mr. Carl G. Weigle, in Stuttgart (Wurtemberg), who will forward his prospectus free of charge.

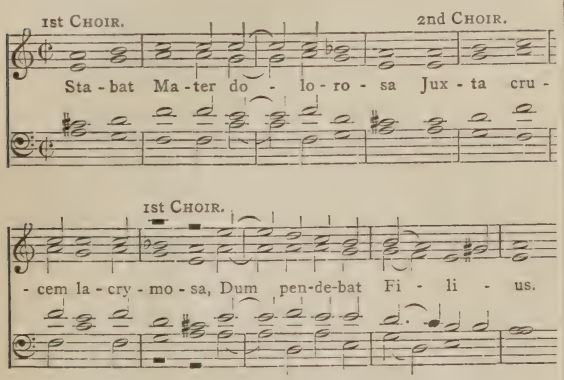
THE MUSICAL TIMES
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
MAY 1, 1896.



IN THE "LAND OF SONG."

Scarcely is Italy the "land of song" at the present moment. Anxious, depressed, groaning under money taxation and the impost of blood called conscription; the prey of a hungry swarm of officials, and fearing, at any moment, an upheaval of now silent and secret forces, the poor country has lost its light heart. At the present time, moreover, there is a bitter sense of national disaster abroad, while amid all sits, in the very capital, a gigantic Protest against the right of Italy to her own—a Protest triple-crowned, patient, armed with weapons more mighty than swords and bayonets, and ever working to subvert. What wonder that the old order has changed and given place to new!—that there are tears where formerly was laughter, and sullen looks instead of smiles! I was in Rome during Easter, and, hoping against hope, sought evidence of popular gladness and rejoicing, but found none, or only such as by rarity, or contrast with surroundings, emphasised the general dulness. Driving towards the city along the Appian Way, on Easter Monday, I came suddenly upon a band of youths playing mandolines, and making believe to be very jolly. Poor lads! there was, as Mark Tapley would have said, some credit in jollity under such circumstances, but it made a sorry show. Perhaps a dozen persons followed the band as though at a funeral; on either side were ruined monuments and under foot were the catacombs. Within the walls, the streets were a little more animated than usual, and the open spaces exhibited, here and there, groups of picturesque peasants from the Campagna. But this was all that, as far as my observation went, distinguished the festal day, once so bright and joyous, from the days preceding and following.

There is one thing in Rome that never changes. In times of rejoicing and in times of sorrow the Church goes on through the round of the ecclesiastical year, observant of its traditions and usages, neither hastening nor delaying; giving no apparent heed to matters exterior; representing in striking fashion to those who can think of it the idea of immutability in a shifting scene. Throughout Holy Week, the churches resounded with the archaic cadences that have been sung since the days of Gregory the Great. Those austere themes—a truly living and vital link with the distant past—seemed, by familiarity, to take possession of the musical listener, though often rendered by harsh and untrained voices, and carried on through the bitter length of the penitential Psalms. They were given, moreover, without accompaniment of any sort, as without vocal harmony. What is the secret of their power? In part, perhaps, their simple dignity; in other part, no doubt, because of the sentiment which we cannot but feel in presence of the venerable in art and usage. We are impressed, moreover, by the fact that these unadorned, nay, these naked strains have come down to us unaffected by the vicissitudes which have destroyed empires and changed the face of the world. Symbols, they, of the great religious system that appears to us as the one stable element in modern life.

The conservatism which has preserved the Gregorian Tones and their primitive use is otherwise illustrated in the shadow of the Vatican. It is true that Rome does not reject works by modern composers, even when they contain features of the kind vulgarly known as "up to date." On Easter Sunday, at the Church of St. John Lateran, I heard a "Mass" by the elder Cappoci, containing harmonic progressions very far from ecclesiastical in character; and it is just possible that the modernising tendency thus illustrated will gain strength as time passes. But change must necessarily be slow in overcoming traditions so strongly rooted as are any of those connected with the Roman Church. Here I may state that the Lateran "Mass" was the only example of musical modernity which came under my observation in Rome, and even that, as already indicated, was "free" only in isolated and widely sundered passages. For the rest, we had Palestrina and his followers. Allegri and Bai—both trained in the strictest school of church music, and each famous as the composer of a "Miserere" always heard during Holy Week in Rome—figured conspicuously, along with later, but not less conscientious masters. All the works of the antique order seemed to me beautiful in their place. They are not adapted, as they were not intended, for concert-rooms, but in a great Roman church their effect is absolutely complete in its impressiveness, and in the sense of fitness it conveys. I know, of course, that tastes differ in this matter as in all others. To some, the "Stabat Mater" of Rossini is far more acceptable than that of Palestrina. Such persons like their church music ornate, as passionate as the music of the stage, and highly coloured. I do not blame them, but the more severe strains of the older school have a greater charm for others, who would sacrifice twenty such works as that of the "Swan of Pesaro" for one by the great reformer who saved church music from degradation at a critical moment. This preference is, perhaps, largely a matter of sentiment, which responds to the appeal of antiquity, but sentiment cannot entirely account for it. To myself personally, Palestrina's music is not only beautiful in design and effect, but comes recommended by a certain abstractedness which peculiarly fits it for association with religious worship. Examples of the modern school seem to bring the world, with its passions and impulses, into the church. They have—I am expressing my own feeling rather than making a general assertion—the aspect of things constructed for another use, and ill-adapted to the task imposed upon them. Compare the well-known opening of Rossini's "Stabat," or even that of Dvorák's work, with the leading strains of Palestrina as, amid the hush of some great church, they steal upon the ear—

There is nothing here but the subtle beauty of sound which has no necessary connection with "earthly grossness" and finds itself at home among the spheres, or in the rarer air breathed by the Singers whom Dante saw:

> Their faces had they all of living flame,
> And wings of gold, and all the rest so white
> No snow unto that limit doth attain.

Whatever comparison we may make between the ancient and modern schools of church music, all must agree that much of the effect produced by the older compositions depends upon the manner of their performance. I had no idea how much till my experience of Holy Week in Rome, which taught me that I had previously heard Palestrina and his followers through a sadly imperfect medium. It will be long before I lose memory of the "Stabat Mater" sung in St. Peter's on Palm Sunday by the highly trained choir of the Giulia Chapel—a body not numerous but able to make twenty-five or thirty sonorous Italian voices do duty for a much larger number. The marvel of their singing was its precision and evenness. As regards the quality last-named, I can compare it only to the sustained chords of an organ, never wavering or varying in intensity. Tradition, with this choir, seems to be against what are sometimes called dynamic effects, and the performance was, so far, exactly opposite in method to that of Henry Leslie's Choir when engaged upon music of the same class. Leslie was a consistent lover of "light and shade" and rarely permitted a dozen bars to be heard without change. On their part, the Roman singers made change from medium power the exception, sometimes a rare exception. The organ pealed on without handling of the stops, and from this may have proceeded some of the sense of abstractedness conveyed by the music. It may be imagined what effect a pianissimo made when it did come, as in the last verse of Allegri's "Miserere," which is directed to be sung Adagio e Piano, Smorzando a poco a poco l'Armonia:—

It is impossible to describe the effect of this close harmony (in nine parts), as sung by the skilled choir, before a darkened altar, stripped of its ornaments, and while the last faint glow of departing day rapidly gave place to night. It seemed, just then, that no other music would have befitted the place and scene. Most solemn of all, perhaps, was the singing of the Reproaches by an unaccompanied solo voice. In this exercise certain of the singers relieved each other—a necessary precaution, for the strain upon the voice must have been very great, especially, one was led to conclude, upon that of the male soprano. I do not know whose were the melodic phrases employed, but they were singularly pathetic and moving. The very spirit of mourning and desolation seemed to breathe in them, above all when the soprano was singing. This was my first opportunity of hearing, under favourable conditions, the special voice in which, as exemplified by Farinelli and others, amateurs of the last century used to take delight. Its effect was, no doubt, aided by the perfect art of the performer—by the fervour of his utterance, and the profound pathos with which he invested every clause of the sacred text, but the voice itself, clear, penetrating, and sympathetic, had much to do with the result. Hardly could the tones be called pleasant, and it was obvious that they would soon weary the ear, but for the note of complaint and expostulation, of sorrow and anguish, they were exactly suited. How deliberately all the solo artists went through this part of their task, giving the long-drawn cadences time to find their way, as it seemed, into the very soul! I can fancy nothing more mournful and pathetic.

Amid the gorgeous ceremonies at St. John Lateran on Easter morning, a different note was struck in performance of Cappoci's "Mass." The tenor soloist, indeed, might have been, and probably was, taken from the boards of an opera-house. At any rate, favoured by the modern Italian fashion of certain passages falling to his share, he sang with a great deal of mundane energy. Hearing him without seeing him, it became hard to resist an impression that a prima donna represented the object of his ardent appeal. This contrast to the austerity of Holy Week was striking, but, to me, no more grateful than the showy and frivolous interludes of the organ. It is not surprising, perhaps, that each of the distinguished churches in Rome has a musical physiognomy different from the others, the explanation being that they are served, in many cases, by distinct nationalities. All Catholic races have permanent institutions near the Vatican, and the consequence is that the Church of St. Silvestre has become the home, so to speak, of the English "faithful," while the noble Gesù is in the hands of the Germans, and so on. What difference nationality makes fully appeared when I contrasted "Tenebræ" at St. Peter's with the same service at the Gesù. In the Jesuit church the choir, about one hundred strong, was made up of students from the German College, not one of whom, probably, could approach, as a singer, within measurable distance of the least competent man belonging to the Giulia Chapel; but they were able, by their discipline, by the solidity of their ensemble, and their admirable rendering of abundant concerted music, to make a great effect. I was present on Holy Thursday what time the clergy, in solemn procession, conveyed the Sacrament to a brilliantly lighted Altar of Repose. The student-choir accompanied the ceremony with chorales sung in four-part harmony of men's voices, unaccompanied; and the effect was splendidly impressive. Nationality, by-the-bye, appeared in other ways. At St. Peter's, during the extended ceremonies, it seemed to me that every man in the throng of dignitaries, assistants, and choirmen went out once or twice. Incessant restlessness was a most irritating feature in the scene. At the Gesù the more stolid Germans kept their ranks unbroken, as they would have done in line of battle, and paid minute attention to the duty of the hour. I am bound to add that in all churches alike the music was for the most part distinguished by earnestness and dignity, to which a certain deliberateness contributed. It is now a question in my mind whether the gabble of chanting and the quick march of psalmody in the English Church be not a mistake—or, rather, there is no question at all. Mistake appears "open, palpable, gross as a mountain."

It was of no avail to search the clerical journals of Rome for announcements of secular music during Holy Week. They simply ignored all such vanities, and the Vatican, had it been able, as in time past, would have taken pretty good care that the doors of opera-house and concert-room were closed and guarded. The Eternal City is now in other hands, and, as a matter of fact, much music other than religious was made during the week of mourning. I noted a Chamber Concert, with Sgambati as pianist, an Orchestral and Choral Concert by the Society of St. Cecilia, a so-called Sacred Concert with Liszt's "Battle of the Huns" in the programme, and, on the first two days of the week, representations of Leoncavallo's "Chatterton" at the Teatro Nazionale. The Concerts did not attract me, as I had only just escaped from those of London, but witnessing the opera was an obligation. Enjoyment of lyric drama under comfortable conditions is not the cheapest of Roman delights. The libretto costs a franc, and admission within the theatre a franc and a half. Then you have to buy a seat; the charge for a stall being six francs. The total thus mounts up to eight and a half francs for each person, while, as the performance, beginning at nine o'clock, rarely ends till past midnight, prudent people pay a cab fare home. On the other hand, there are no sumptuary regulations. The claw-hammer coat rarely meets the eye, and the most towering of feminine hats makes its unrestricted way into the stalls, where, however, it becomes subject to public opinion and, sometimes, must needs be removed.

"Chatterton," as most people have read, is founded upon a romance of the same name by Alfred de Vigny, and was composed by Leoncavallo before he became famous through the "Pagliacci." The hero of the story is indeed the Bristol blue-coat boy who perpetrated the Rowley forgeries, and, when reproached by Horace Walpole, smartly answered, "Who wrote 'Otranto'?" But how changed a Chatterton is here! De Vigny presents him in the romance, and Leoncavallo has adopted him in the libretto, as a grown man, educated at Oxford, the college friend of a real live lord, and at first the secret, finally the avowed lover of Mrs. Clark, wife of a flourishing manufacturer, in whose house he lodges. After this, anything. But the operatic Chatterton does touch the real person at a few points. He is a poet; he is poor and proud, he lives in an attic, and dies by poison self-administered. The dramatist even attempts to reproduce a well-known picture of the unhappy suicide stretched upon his pallet. These resemblances, however, only aggravate what is dissimilar. Fancy Lord Klifford with a party of gay dogs seeking John Clark's hospitality when out hunting, and discovering in the poet-lodger his college chum "Tom"! Fancy our "marvellous boy" quarrelling with his noble friend because of all too pressing attentions bestowed upon the lady of the house! Fancy the proud peer coming later with an offer of renewed friendship, and proof of his influence with the Lord Mayor of London, in the shape of a letter offering a post in the chief magistrate's household! Fancy much more as far removed from the real Chatterton as from the man in the moon, and then imagine the compound of wonder and amusement with which an Englishman witnesses the opera. For all that the libretto is well constructed. Its gathering gloom is relieved by the part of a young boy, Mrs. Clark's brother, whose affection for Chatterton finds engaging expression. But he is withdrawn as the catastrophe approaches, and the darkness of a very dramatic and impressive last act knows no ray of light. After Chatterton has taken the poison, and in the course of a passionate interview with Mrs. Clark, she declares her love for him. Then he would live, but it is too late, and the shock kills the woman, while the man staggers to his attic to die. The tragedy is as powerful as anything in modern art.

The music of "Chatterton" bears a general resemblance to that of "I Pagliacci," and of Young Italy, as represented by other composers. This statement suggests broad rather than elaborated effects; high colours plentifully laid on, rather than delicate shading, and an abundance of noise, appealing to the nerves rather than to artistic appreciation. But the opera contains passages which somewhat surprised me by their contrast to the bulk of the work. These are met with in a few light scenes, as, for example, that following the entrance of Lord Klifford and his companions. Many of the touches are really delicate, and show that the composer's powers are not confined to piling uproar upon uproar, or tearing a passion to tatters. But, whether from choice or fancied necessity, the "Chatterton" music is mainly of an intense kind. He appears to fancy that even moderation in the use of means is a sign of weakness; so, whether the stage dialogue or business require strenuous expression or no, it is attended by strenuous music. The trombones are never quiet long together, the whole orchestra, in point of fact, is kept at its loudest, and the poor people on the stage strain their voices in order to be heard at all. The result may be effect, as noise-loving people conceive it, but certainly is very low and vulgar art. As a matter of policy—if it be conceded that a man may degrade music in order to become popular—I do not blame Leoncavallo's procedure, which the Roman audience encouraged by applauding most loudly when the din was greatest and the singers came nearest to breaking a blood-vessel. The half-educated crowd in all countries do the same, and the temptation to humour them is, of course, very great. There is little need for details concerning the solos and concerted pieces in "Chatterton." Apart from the exceptions above pointed out, a strong family likeness runs through them, the melodies are almost interchangeable and the same "catchy" devices are repeatedly used. Yet in listening we are conscious of power, ill-directed and abused, no doubt, but unmistakably there. The performance was quite good, and owed much to the soprano and tenor, excellent artists who accepted the obligations laid upon them and made prodigal expenditure of force. At moments I found myself wondering whether the last will and testament of each of them had been duly drawn up and signed; also whether a priest was kept on duty.

Joseph Bennett.

FROM MY STUDY.

The letter from Balfe to E. T. Smith, of which a fac-simile is now given, tells its own story. Balfe, as will be seen, wrote from St. Petersburg, whither he had gone with his daughter, Victoria. He had, not long before, and during an experimental winter season at Her Majesty's Theatre under Lumley, brought out "La Zingara," an Italian version of the "Bohemian Girl," the chief characters sustained by such artists as Piccolomini, Alboni, Giuglini, and Beletti. The success of the popular work in this form, and with these artists, proved to be very great, so delighting Lumley that, in a burst of gratitude, he presented the composer with a cheque for £50—a sum stated to have been considerably in excess of author's rights. Balfe was otherwise fortunate at this period. His "Satanella," produced at Covent Garden by the Pyne and Harrison company in 1858, made a "hit," and a profitable tour in the provinces just before that event contributed to a season of prosperity. It is not stated that the St. Petersburg journey had a professional object, and probably was intended to renew many pleasant friendships made during a previous visit. He was a favourite in the Russian capital, which accepted him "on sight." "I have done splendidly here," he wrote home, "the Russians have positively taken a fancy to me, and I have all the prettiest women in St. Petersburg as pupils. I shall come back here next season, of course. The Empress herself has had the goodness to request me to return. I really cannot speak in too high terms of all the Imperial family. I am spoiled by them, and, what is almost better, have received splendid presents." The Crimean war followed, and Balfe did not re-visit St. Petersburg till the time when his letter to E. T. Smith was written.

There is some reason to conclude that the second Russian journey was undertaken in the interest of Victoria Balfe. At any rate, it resulted in her marriage to Sir John Crampton, the English ambassador at the Court of St. Petersburg—an event concerning which Balfe

Dear Mr Smith

I hear you have taken Her majesty's Theatre will you have me at my old post to have trouble and time I want a salary £30 a week I will work like a Slave and be very useful as well as ornamental a time there directed post restante will find

Your very truly

W. W. Bulls

wrote to an old friend: "I am going to give you a little news that will surprise you, and I am sure you will be pleased to hear that my darling child Victoire is to be married to an ambassador at the Court, Sir John Crampton, at the end of this week, and her mother and your old friend, the father, return home childless! Well, now both my girls are provided for, and I am a happy old gentleman. You will also be glad that the Court have expressed their satisfaction, and my girl has an audience of the Grand Duchess Constantine, to receive her felicitations." The union proved most unfortunate, and, as the result of a nullity suit, was dissolved. Victoria Balfe subsequently married a Spanish nobleman, the Duke de Frias.

Family concerns abroad, as we see, did not prevent Balfe from keeping an eye on his interests at home, and hence the letter we now publish. He had been Lumley's conductor through the stormy period of the great secession to Covent Garden, and had experienced many troubles as well as triumphs; but the bâton had a fascination for him, as, apparently, for musicians generally. We may conceive that he longed to be back again in his old post, though under a new and precarious management; also that the modest remuneration of thirty pounds a week had charms. As it turned out, Balfe's application was unsuccessful, the appointment falling to Arditi.

Autograph letters by Balfe are said to be scarce. On this point his biographer, W. A. Barrett, remarks: "He had a strong dislike to writing long letters. Those of his communications which exist are preserved as treasures by his friends because of their rarity. They are brief, and refer to matters apparently understood between himself and his correspondents, and are further disappointing as they seldom bear other date than the day of the week."

The autograph signature of Ambroise Thomas will be of interest to students of handwriting. In neatness and precision it exactly represents the engaging composer and amiable man who has so recently passed from us.

It amuses me much to collect journalistic failures in the form of periodicals that have exemplified human life by appearing for a little time and then vanishing away. Some of them are very scarce and hard to find, a remorseless fate having apparently resolved to wipe out all traces of their existence. But when found they are often worth preserving, quite apart from the lesson they teach as monuments of wasted endeavour.

Possibly some of my readers recollect an ephemeral monthly called The Mask, which ran, or, I should say, crawled, infantwise, from February to December, 1868, and then died what, it is to be hoped, was a painless death. The Mask professed to be "a humorous and fantastic Review of the Month," and was run by a staff of two men—Alfred Thompson, who drew the illustrations, and Leopold Lewis, who supplied the whole of the letterpress. The editors prided themselves upon this arrangement, remarking in the preface to their first (and last) volume: "Long before M. Rochefort produced La Lanterne we had conceived the idea of projecting a magazine which should depend exclusively upon its editors both for letterpress and illustrations." They add: "Every article in the present volume has been written by one or other of the two editors." It may be doubted whether the public felt as satisfied with the arrangement as did Messrs. Thompson and Lewis, since the contents of the journal, though clever enough, are sadly lacking in variety of style and way of dealing with things. The Mask was not unmusical. It published a song every month, generally of a "popular" character, and Mr. Leopold Lewis, whom I met often at the Albion Tavern in days gone by, occasionally shed the light of his intellect upon topics artistic. In an article headed "Offenbach the Favourite," Mr. Lewis distinctly anticipated the present-day practice of supporting an opinion by assailing somebody who does not agree with it. Wishing to praise Offenbach, he "pitched into" Henry Chorley, who, it is conceivable, did not care in the slightest degree what The Mask thought of him on that subject or any other. The subjoined remarks might have been printed yesterday:—

"In the face of such a great musical critic as the gentleman who vents his gall in the Athenæum from week to week, we candidly own a great liking for Offenbach . . . . Musical fanatics are as bad as religious bigots, they cannot tolerate anything beneath one standard, and they despise everyone who is not as equally wrongheaded as themselves. The Athenæum critic has been brought up in the school which dates from the days of the Antient Concerts, when you might meet in every drawing-room a quartet of old gentlemen who scraped out sonatas (!) till their audience went to sleep or disappeared." Having performed this unnecessary war-dance, the editor of The Mask set himself to prove that "Offenbach is champagne of the most sparkling and exhilarating vintage." Here I leave him. Among the cartoons supplied by Alfred Thompson is one entitled "The Rival Shows." It represents the "parade" of two travelling companies at a fair. To the left is Mapleson's, with the manager, bland and persuasive, inviting the public to walk up, while Arditi blows a cornet and H. Jennings beats a drum. In rear and in costume are Tietjens, Trebelli, Nilsson, Kellogg, Santley, Gassier, Tom Hohler (with an inward bend at the knees), and Beverley. The Gye forces are similarly displayed on the other side; music by Costa (clarinet) and A. Harris (drum). Both managers address the crowd. Says Gye:

"Look here, here's our wonderful rising boy tenor, Mario—only nineteen years old—who never uttered a false note in his life. Don't crowd in too fast, ladies; the Cupid of the stage is going to sing, and he's now striking the tuning-fork. Here's the adorable Patti; we give her £50 for every note she sings, and she brings us £100 for every £50. Don't keep back. She won't be here long; she's going to enter into partnership for life with a distinguished Marquis. Here's the charming Lucca, the variable Lucca, the entrancing little Lucca, who has promised never to run away again. Besides, here's Tagliafico, the grand utility, and Lemmens-Sherrington, the great available, and a whole host of others. Walk up!"

Mr. Mapleson, not to be outdone:

"Here, listen to me. I can give you the best entertainment in Europe. I've got Kellog, the celebrated, never to be equalled American soprano, and Nilsson, fresh from the Grand Opéra—the greatest hit ever known. And I've got Titiens, singing with twenty thousand horse-power—and Trebelli, the only contralto now known on the face of the globe. Besides this, I've got Gassier for our Mephistopheles, and Santley, the great unalloyed English baritone, who doesn't call himself Signor. . . . We play every opera they play next door, and always at the same time, to keep up the novelty and to give variety. No extra charge and no money returned."

Reading this in the forgotten pages of an extinct journal is something like listening to the voice of a dead man through a phonograph, or wandering about an old battlefield picking up exploded cartridge cases. And to such a pass must come the rivalries and boastings and disputations which now appear to us so important. X.

SIR GEORGE GROVE ON BEETHOVEN'S SYMPHONIES.*

It should be borne in mind that Sir George Grove, with Dr. William Pole as his coadjutor, commenced his career as an annotator of analytical programme-books early in the fifties, when the so-called New Philharmonic Society (since deceased) was first established under the conductorship of Berlioz, and that having thus served his apprenticeship, he soon afterwards transferred his services to the Crystal Palace, where, as editor of, and contributor to the programme-books of the Saturday Concerts, he has zealously officiated up to the present date, and, it is to be hoped, will long be spared to continue the good work which he initiated there. Considering the length of his services and the enthusiasm he has displayed, it is no exaggeration to speak of him as our oldest and most experienced prographist. Recalling the energy and enthusiasm with which, during the last forty years, he has advocated the claims of Beethoven, as well as of Schubert, Mendelssohn, and Schumann, but more especially those of Beethoven, it is no surprise that he should at length have made up his mind to collect his utterances, and, with some account of his researches, issue them in book form. The result is before us, and calls for nothing but congratulation both to the author and to his readers.

It should at once be stated that this volume of Sir George Grove's is by no means, as might be suspected, a mere reprint of his programme notices, which on each occasion of their being used he has, by means of additions and subtractions, repeatedly revised. Though it may be said to include the previously published analyses, these have been greatly extended and remodelled, especial care having been taken with the music examples, which are much more fully furnished with marks of expression and phrasing, &c., than heretofore has been the case. No attempt has been made to supply an account of Beethoven's life, except so far as it bears upon the Symphonies. That is to be found, fully set forth by the same pen, in the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians."

In an all too modest preface Sir George Grove states that his book is addressed by an amateur to amateurs. "It would be presumptuous in me," he adds, "to attempt to interest professional musicians, who naturally know already all that I have been able to put together, and much more; and in a more complete and accurate manner." We demur strongly to both these statements. There are amateurs and amateurs—the word being used in a double sense—viz., those who, like John Ruskin, Gambier Parry, and Sir George Grove, have devoted a great part of their lives to exploring and expounding art; and those who look at pictures or listen to music simply for their amusement and enjoyment. It is to these latter that this book is ostensibly addressed, but we have no hesitation in asserting that there is no professional musician who, after a careful perusal of it, will not admit that, from a musical, historical, and psychological point of view, he has learnt more about Beethoven and his works than ever he knew before. To the preface is appended a long list of books which will be found most useful to students who desire further to pursue their investigations of Beethoven and his works.

A great part of the book is taken up by musical analyses of the Symphonies. These amply serve the purpose for which they were intended—viz., the instruction and rousing the interest of amateur listeners. Excellent as they are from this point of view, young professional students of music should be warned against accepting them as models in the art of analysis. Something more far-reaching, more complete, and more technical would probably be required by examiners from students desiring to pass an examination at any of our leading academical musical institutions. The amateur occasionally peeps out in Sir George's musical phraseology; as, for instance, when he speaks of the alternation of two distinct notes as a tremolo. This serves the intended purpose of identifying a passage, but technically it is incorrectly expressed. Similarly (on page 114) a progression is spoken of as "chromatic," when "diatonic" is evidently intended. Such little lapses are few and far between, and will doubtless be amended in a second edition.

*Wagner wrote: "It is quite impossible to avoid falling into an ecstatic tone when speaking of the true nature of Beethoven's music." Sir George, in the highest degree, seems to have been influenced by the same feeling. His utterances about Beethoven's music form one continuous pæan. Still, he cannot be accused of indiscriminately awarding his praise. Though he greatly admires the first two Symphonies—and who does not?—he readily admits that when Beethoven wrote them he was still more or less under the influence of Haydn and Mozart, but asserts, and rightly too, that in the Coda of the Finale of the Second Symphony "we can survey at a glance the region which lies behind—the music of the eighteenth century, at once strong, orderly, elegant, humorous, if, perhaps, somewhat demure; and that more ideal region of deeper feeling, loftier imagination, and keener thrill, radiant with 'the light that never was on sea or land,' a region which was opened by Beethoven."

With the "Eroica" we enter on this new region at a bound. It is one from which Beethoven, ever afterwards holding to the "new road," never departed. The "Eroica" is avowedly a portrait of Buonaparte, but, at the same time, as Sir George remarks, it is as much a portrait of Beethoven himself. Bearing in mind Count Tolstoi's dictum that all serious music represents the composer's mood of mind at the time of its conception, the same may be said of all the Symphonies. But to this it should be added that it is only the greatest genius who, when writing to a picture, can, like a great actor, put himself into the required frame of mind. This is what Beethoven always succeeded in doing—at least in his Symphonies.

Recent researches have proved that the three love-letters which were found in Beethoven's desk after his death, and which were formerly believed to have been addressed to the Countess Giulietta Guicciardi, were really intended for the Countess Theresa of Brunswick, to whom Beethoven became engaged in 1806. While writing the Fourth Symphony his heart must have been swelling with his new happiness. Sir George therefore regards it "as the pæan which he sings over his conquest." Translations of these love-letters, as well as of Beethoven's "Testament," are included in the volume.

The Fifth Symphony, started in 1805, and laid aside in 1806 for that in B flat, was completed in 1807 or early in 1808. It thus covered the time before the engagement, the engagement itself, and a part of the period of agitation when the lovers were separated, and which ended in their final surrender. "Considering the extraordinarily imaginative and disturbed character of the Symphony," Sir George writes, "it is impossible not to believe that the work—the first movement, at any rate—is based on his relations to the Countess, and is more or less a picture of their personality and connection. . . . The first movement seems to contain actual portraits of the two chief actors in the drama." This seems to be substantiated by reference to the well-known story of the music lesson. Quoting the words which Beethoven is reported to have said of the first theme, "Fate is knocking at the door," Sir George asks: "Was it the Fate which at that early time he saw advancing to prevent his union with his Theresa?—to prevent his union with any woman?"

As a recollection of country life, the Pastoral Symphony speaks for itself. If the three preceding Symphonies have been occupied with the workings of the human mind and will, and have, as it were, kept us suspended over the memory of a hero, the rapture of an accepted lover, the conflict of his subsequent joys and sorrows, and the ultimate triumph of his spirit over all obstacles, this takes us into an entirely different field—the realms of Nature.

Speaking of the Seventh Symphony, which Sir George maintains might fairly be entitled the "Romantic Symphony," he strongly condemns Berlioz for wishing us to believe that the Vivace of the first movement is a Ronde des Paysans; Wagner, for regarding the whole Symphony as the "Apotheosis of the Dance"; and some dozen other writers who have hazarded interpretations of it, and which have been collected by M. Brenet in his "Histoire de la Symphonie." He does not, however, offer a substitute for any of them.

The Eighth Symphony, which Sir George would like to dub the "Humorous," he regards as "autobiographical," inasmuch as, perhaps more than any other of the nine, it furnishes a portrait of the master in his daily life—his boisterous merriment, his rough practical jokes, and bad puns.

To the Ninth Symphony, the greatest of all, by far the longest and most complete analysis, including no less than eighty-six music examples, is devoted. Between the composition of this and the Eighth Symphony there was a gap of not less than eleven years, the historical particulars of which are fully accounted for. It is to be regretted, perhaps, that Sir George has not drawn upon Wagner's wondrous explanatory programme of the poetical drift of this Symphony by reference to Goethe's "Faust." To some extent the conclusion he comes to agrees with that of Wagner. Incidentally he regards the first movement as a picture of Beethoven's misery, arising from the fact that "his heart, morbid no doubt, was torn almost beyond endurance by the unseemly, squalid disorder which attended his home life, and the unavailing anxieties and privations which he endured for his nephew." With the Scherzo we are again brought face to face with Nature. The Trio, it is suggested, possibly reproduces "the feeling of some sunrise which Beethoven had 'seen through the mist' on the hills above his beloved 'Bruhl' at Mödling, or at Baden—occasions which seem to have awakened all his religion and all his poetry." The Adagio, which is spoken of as "a beautiful dream," Sir George maintains "is absolutely original in form; and in effect more calmly, purely, nobly beautiful than anything that ever this great master—who knows so well how to search the heart, and try the spirit, and elevate the soul—has accomplished elsewhere in his Symphonies."

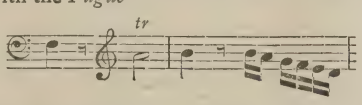
We are warned that, "no connection need be looked for between the first three movements of the Choral Symphony and the 'Ode to Joy' which inspired its Finale. The very title of the work—Beethoven's own—is conclusive on this point. It is not a Symphony on Schiller's 'Ode to Joy,' but it is a Symphony with Final Chorus on Schiller's 'Ode to Joy'—Sinfonie mit Schluss-Chor über Schiller's Ode an die Freude." Later on, when speaking of the manner in which Beethoven has connected the instrumental movements with the vocal portion of the work, we are told that "hitherto, in the three orchestral movements, Beethoven has been depicting 'Joy' in his own proper character: first, as part of the complex life of the individual; secondly, for the world at large; thirdly, in all the ideal hues that art can throw over it." Surely there is no "joy" depicted in the first movement, unless we except the joy of resignation or of determination in overcoming all obstacles.

We have thus endeavoured, as briefly as possible and very imperfectly, to reproduce Sir George's characterisations of Beethoven's Symphonies from a poetical point of view. What he says is full of interest and thoroughly convincing. At the same time, it seems impossible to divine exactly what is the standpoint which he takes in regard to so-called "programme" music. He quotes Mendelssohn's saying that "music is far more definite than words," which, curiously enough, seems to agree with Wagner's assertion that "where human speech ends, musical utterance begins"; he never tires of impressing upon us Beethoven's "more an expression of feeling than a painting" and that "all painting in instrumental music, if pushed too far, is a failure," as canons of art; but, at the same time, he expresses regret that Beethoven did not give the clue to the poetic meaning of all his Symphonies, as he did to the "Eroica" and the "Pastoral." Had he done so, it would have added much, he thinks, to the pleasure of listening to the Symphonies. Perhaps so, but it should not be forgotten that the artistic endowment of the man who cannot listen to a musical work for its own sake, and cannot absorb its beauty quietly and enjoy it until he has made a picture out of it or translated it into words, is likely to be literary rather than musical.

Space fails us to do more than very lightly touch upon three specially interesting points of Sir George's book. Beethoven's sketch-books are largely drawn upon, and thus we are allowed many a peep into Beethoven's workshop, where we are enabled, as it were, to follow his process of creation from its earliest beginnings. Where they are not his own, full reference is given in foot-notes to the source of his researches, so that really earnest students may have no difficulty in going to the fountain-head for confirmation of the information and abundant anecdotes related. Many examples are given of the stupidities of Beethoven's early critics, including such eminent musicians as Spohr and Weber, &c. In their behalf it may be said that, as Beethoven's scores were not published till many years after their first performances, they had nothing to go upon but a first hearing of music which introduced them to an entirely new world. Happy we of the present day, that we are not in a like position!

A LETTER OF BEETHOVEN'S.



A part of this letter has appeared in a free translation by Lady Wallace, from "Neue Briefe Beethoven's," collected and given to the public by Ludwig Nohl, in 1867. The present owner of the letter, Mr. A. J. Hipkins, regards it as of sufficient value and importance to place it before musical students in a complete form, and to that end he has enlisted the sympathetic collaboration of Miss Geisler Schubert, the grand-niece of another great composer, to decipher the almost illegible text and present it in an almost literal English form. To admirers of Beethoven in England the letter is of particular interest, inasmuch as the subject-matter concerns the corrections for a London publisher of the great Pianoforte Sonata in B flat (Op. 106). But there are personal allusions, from which Sir George Grove has quoted in his biography of Beethoven in the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," referring to anxieties arising from an unsettled income, so that to secure the English edition of the Sonata the composer was induced to suggest another sequence of the movements, and even the suppression of the Largo and Fugue. Two or three words have been effaced in the letter by the sealing, as indicated in the translation. The italics are from his own underlining. Beethoven also touches upon a visit to London which unfortunately never came to pass. The letter was addressed to his friend and former pupil, Ferdinand Ries, from whom it passed to a younger brother, Joseph Ries, for many years connected with the house of Broadwood. To Joseph Ries the possession of it became as a sacred treasure, and as such he bequeathed it, together with a complete collection of Ferdinand Ries's compositions, to Mr. Hipkins. It was shown in the memorable Loan Collection at the Royal Albert Hall, Kensington, in connection with the Inventions and Music Exhibition of 1885.

The letter is addressed to "Monsieur Ferdinand Ries, 57, Upper Norton Street, Fitzroy Square, Londres."

London Postmark (April 6, 1819).

Dear R.,—Forgive me again and again for the trouble I cause you. It is to me inconceivable how so many mistakes should have occurred in copying the Sonata. The fault may rest with haste, the copyist having entrusted it to another instead of doing it himself. By playing through first the examples copied out here the mistakes will be found; many are, perhaps, already corrected. Be good enough to count and note down the bars from 10 to 20, to 100, 200, &c. It will then soon be easy to improve all this. You must write me what it costs. My metronome is broken, through which not yet the tempos; I shall get it back in a few days. The incorrect copying proceeds from my no longer being able to keep a copyist of my own. Circumstances have brought this about, and may God mend it! Until the Archduke R. comes to a better position this may yet last a whole year. It is really dreadful how these things have come about, and what has become of my salary, and what it will be until the aforesaid year has gone by? If the Sonata is not right for London I could send another, or you might leave out the Largo and begin the last movement at once with the Fugue— or the first movement, then the Adagio, and for the 3rd, the Scherzo, and No. 4 comes the Largo, and Allegro Risoluto left out altogether . . . . or only the first movement and Scherzo . . . . I leave it to you as you find best. For the moment it would constrain me very much to write a new one, as I am very busy with other things. This Sonata has been written in harassing circumstances, it is hard to write almost for bread, and I have only got so far. We will write again about coming to London. It would certainly be the only deliverance for me out of this wretched embarrassed state, in which I am neither well, nor can produce that which, under more favourable circumstances, might be possible. I will wait here for the publication of the Sonata until you write to me. I beg of you to let it be soon, so that you can send me the money, and at the same time indicate when it will come out in London, that I may arrange here. It is of consequence the Sonata should be published as soon as possible there, so that the publisher here should not have too long to wait. I will, at the same time, send the English publisher the copyright document for England. The Quintet is already engraved.

In haste, your friend,

Beethoven.

THE PIANOFORTE AND ITS ENEMIES.

The number of expert performers on the pianoforte is probably even greater than that of minor poets or lady novelists. Add to this category all those individuals who are perfectly ready to oblige at an evening party, and the aggregate will run into hundreds of thousands. Furthermore, when one takes into account the pianistic activities of the Board Schools, the unthinking observer may be pardoned for anticipating the speedy advent of a musical millennium—at least, so far as quantity is concerned. But in music, as in everything else, the great law of compensation holds good. And just as wars and pestilences act as a check on population, so tendencies are already observable which bid fair to counteract the unbridled tyranny of the domestic virtuoso. We have the greatest admiration for the pianoforte in its proper place and at the proper time. When played by a musician it is a most delightful instrument. Unfortunately the pianoforte exerts a fatal fascination upon those who have not the slightest claim to that title, and so it has come about that many of the greatest musicians of the century have come to hold it in something like abhorrence. Wagner, it is true, was a mere bungler at the keyboard, and Berlioz, who despised it, was even less expert; but his successor on the staff of the Débats, the distinguished critic and composer, M. Reyer, is noted for the vehement animosity he has always displayed against the instrument. Instances might easily be multiplied, but enough has been said to show that hostility to the pianoforte is by no means a sign of an unmusical temperament, but rather the reverse. Against public performers it is easy to protect yourself—so long as you are not a musical critic—by the simple process of abstention. The pianoforte on the hearth—so to speak—is a more serious matter, though here it can be dodged, repressed, or even suppressed. But the pianoforte next door is the real grievance. A Scottish authority has recently informed the Gaelic Society that the bagpipes can be heard for eight miles. Many of us would be content to hear the pianoforte at a distance of even a quarter of a mile. But that is impossible, nor does it mitigate the sufferings of the pianophobe to learn that New York is even worse off than London in this respect. Here we may appropriately transcribe the experiences of a writer in the New York Critic which, mutatis mutandis, may be paralleled by many of the dwellers in flat-land over here:—

> Someone asked me the other day how I should like to hear a certain Etude in A flat. I answered that person that if there was anything in this world that I despised it was to hear music in a flat, and if my friend had had my experience, he would never have asked me such a question. Below a flat in which I recently lived there was a young man who thought he had a gift for music. If a gift for music is the same as a gift for breaking stones with one's fists, then I should say that this young man had it, and had it to the verge of genius. I have heard all the famous pianists who have played in this country in the last quarter of the century and I have never heard one—with, perhaps, the exception of the Cowboy Pianist—who had his wrist power. . . . He had no intention of taking up music as a profession; indeed, I heard that he proposed to study for the ministry, and the thought now occurs to me that, perhaps, he was practising pulpit pounding. He was a young man, as I have said, but he played the most old-fashioned music. I do not mean Palestrina and the Gregorian chants, but the sort of music that was fashionable in country drawing-rooms thirty or forty years ago. His pièce de résistance was a song called "Beautiful dreamer wake unto me," which has been arranged as a pianoforte "morceau"! It has a rich, rumbling bass, which, I am sure, is played with crossed hands. That peculiar richness can be produced in no other way. You have no idea of the havoc that such a piece can make with one's nerves. You wish that you had never been born, or that, having been born, your lines might have been cast in some place where pianos were unknown. I wonder if one has absolutely no protection against pianos? I doubt whether he has, for was it not here in New York that a man who lay dying, last winter, sent word to a woman who was pounding a piano in a room on the other side of his party-wall, asking her if she would not stop for a few moments and let him die in peace, to which she replied that she didn't care how he died, and that she was going to play as long and as loud as she liked, as it was her own house. And, being as good as her word, she played on, and the man died to her music. Why can't we have a Raines Piano Bill? [This refers to the new Liquor Law.] I am sure it would be popular, and would help the cause of temperance, too, for I believe that many a man has been driven out of his home at night by the playing of a piano in some other house than his own.

There is a touch of American extravagance about the foregoing, but it will none the less appeal to many really musical readers of these columns. For we also know that young man, or his English double, who develops his muscle on the keyboard at the expense of his neighbour's equanimity. And that moves us to express our surprise that Mr. Edison has never turned his attention to what, if he could achieve it, would be one of the humanest and most beatific inventions of the age—we mean some simple but absolutely efficacious method of shutting off external sounds. Think of the bliss of the brainworker who could thus defy the ravages of the organ-grinder, the newsboy, et hoc genus omne!

The pianoforte, as we have seen, has to contend, first of all, with overt enemies like M. Reyer, and secondly, with injudicious devotees. The worst wounds are proverbially those which are received in the house of our friends, and this is eminently true where the pianoforte is concerned. The misdeeds of one section of these wrong-doers have already been commented upon above. Even more prejudicial to the cult of the pianoforte, however, are those public exhibitions with a recrudescence of which we are now threatened. About two years ago we transcribed from a Lancashire paper in these columns the full, true, and complete account of the Recital, lasting for forty consecutive hours, given at Stockport by a Mr. Napoleon Bird. We hoped at the time that finality had been reached in the matter of these preposterous displays of endurance, and as the months lengthened into years that hope bade fair to deepen into conviction. Alas! these pleasing illusions have been shattered within the last week or two. A Signor Camillo Baucia, of Cuneo, in Italy, has broken Mr. Bird's record. Mr. Bird is reported to have challenged him to play for fifty hours, and laborious punsters have already begun to make jokes about pianofortitude and the pianofifty.

Of the discredit which is fastened on the pianoforte by professors who reduce it to the level of a mere punching block, it is unnecessary to speak. But, in conclusion, we may point out that a new and most formidable enemy of the pianoforte has arisen of late in the bicycle. The bicycle is not intrinsically antagonistic to the keyboard, but as a matter of fact there are literally thousands of young ladies whose leisure hours, formerly passed in large part on the music-stool, are now spent in the saddle of the "iron bird," as a lady journalist has poetically described the bicycle. Nay, more than this, proof positive is afforded by advertisements which announce the sale of pianofortes by individuals at a great sacrifice on the ground that their owners are "going in for cycling." The manufacturers are already said to have complained of the adverse effect of the craze on their business, while it is alleged that, after bicycling for any length of time, many ladies find their wrists ache so much as to render pianoforte playing well-nigh impossible. Altogether the outlook is exceedingly serious. Madame Melba's conversion to cyclomania can be regarded with tranquillity, as she is a singer. But how terrible it would be, for example, if M. Paderewski were to succumb to the craze! As it is, we should not be at all surprised to find the leading firms transmogrifying their business to suit the fashion of the hour, or to see the market flooded with cottage, overstrung, boudoir, semi-grand, or iron-grand bicycles.

Considering how widespread is the love of music, it is surprising that while so much is done to educate the performer, little or nothing is done to educate the listener. We venture to urge the point upon those concerned with music as teachers. Many, of course, do not admit that "listening" is an art to be improved by education. A short time ago, for instance, Mr. F. H. Cowen, in a bright little article on "The Art of Composition," which appeared in a contemporary, took up this view, and affirmed that the "lover of music must possess an innate feeling for the beauties of the art to be able to understand and appreciate them." Now, surely this is only partially true. Love for a thing may come (and very often does) as the result of understanding it. What we do not understand is generally repellent. It may be true, as Mr. Cowen affirms, that a greater proportion of "the educated masses" take an "intelligent interest" in literature, painting, poetry, &c., than they do in music; but when Mr. Cowen explains this by saying that music "appeals to a subtle sense comparatively rare in existence," we fancy the facts are against him. So far from being "rare," this "subtle sense" is possessed almost universally. Savages in all parts of the world manifest a positive passion for music; the "common people" in every land have songs and dance tunes which they transmit from generation to generation, and a complete collection of which would fill several hundred volumes; every street urchin whistles and sings, or buys or makes a musical instrument of some kind and exhibits exemplary patience in learning to play a tune upon it; if a piano-organ appears in a "slum" a crowd gathers to listen and is even willing to pay for the privilege. Why, from time immemorial every religious sect has recognised the power of music over the hearts of men and utilised it with the most successful results. Think of Luther and his magnificent hymn-tunes; of John Wesley and his; of the Revivalists, such as Moody and Sankey; of the Salvation Army tunes and bands. No, no, Mr. Cowen, it is the absence of the musical sense that is rare—not its presence. Says Mr. Cowen: "Not only the composer, but the intelligent listener must be born, not made." And this, we think, is just where the mistake comes in. It is, in our opinion, precisely the "intelligent listener," as distinguished from the raw-material "lover of music," that has to be "made," and cannot, in the very nature of the case, be "born." Take anyone who is "fond of music"—that is to say, of a "tune"; and, given time and the proper conditions, you may make of him, according to his brain power, a more or less "intelligent listener." It is just this branch of musical education (upon which the welfare of composers so much depends) that is least attended to in our educational curriculum; and thus, while we have plenty of music-lovers, we have few intelligent listeners. To put the matter in a nut-shell: Every intelligent listener must be a lover of music, but every music-lover is not, necessarily, an intelligent listener.

The recently discovered remains of Johann Sebastian Bach are about to be transferred to the renovated and enlarged Church of St. John, Leipzig, in whose adjoining churchyard they have so long reposed, destitute of any indication as to their locality, and a worthy memorial is at length to be erected over them. To defray the cost of such a monument should, and no doubt would have been, in the first place, the ambition of the town of Leipzig itself, if only to remove thereby, to some extent, the stain on its 'scutcheon which its neglect of the great cantor's grave had imprinted there. It was rightly judged, however, that the matter was not one of local, but of national concern; not of national concern only, but one in which the entire musical world is interested. Hence the publication in the Leipzig papers of a general invitation to subscribe to the object in question by a committee, headed by the worthy pastor of St. John, the Rev. F. G. Tranzschel, and Dr. Joachim, and including the names of many others distinguished in arts and sciences, amongst them Johannes Brahms, Professor His, Dr. Carl Reinecke, and Sir George Grove. The sculptor of the memorial is to be Herr Sefftner, of Leipzig, whose wonderful bust, modelled over the skull of the master, has been the admiration of music-lovers the world over. May he be inspired to produce a work of art not unworthy of his subject. For while the genius of a Bach can dispense with a symbol of his greatness wrought in marble, the sculptor who would employ his chisel in such a task must needs be himself a great artist to render it justice.

Was Mozart aware of Handel's propensity for borrowing? This is a question by no means easy to answer. It is, however, curious to find the composer of "Don Juan" apparently adopting a similar method—nay, borrowing from Handel himself. For the fugue in the Kyrie of the Requiem he not only takes the theme from the closing "Hallelujah" of Handel's "Joseph," but also its counter-subject. We here place the two masters side by side:—

Handel begins in major, Mozart in minor; in the course of the chorus, however, Handel introduces it in minor and Mozart in major. This reminiscence was first pointed out, we believe, by the Abbé Stadler. Gottfried Weber also called attention to the resemblance between the opening of this very Kyrie and that of the opening chorus of Handel's Funeral Anthem for Queen Caroline.

Here are the opening bars for voices in each:—

The "Requiem" was finished by Süssmayer, and the exact share which he had in the work is still doubtful. Then, again, Mozart was writing to order and in a hurry; further, the hand of death was on him. He may, therefore, have eagerly seized upon the Handel ready-made fugue and counter-subject so as to advance the quicker. The composer was so rich in melodic invention that in his latter days the idea of borrowing can scarcely, one would think, have entered his head.

Audi alteram partem. The two "superfluous" bars in the Scherzo of Beethoven's Symphony in C minor are, naturally, the subject of comment in Sir G. Grove's recently published work, "Beethoven and his Nine Symphonies." The letter written by Beethoven to Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel would seem to dispose of the question—i.e., to justify their deletion. In France, however, the two bars, in spite of Beethoven's letter, have been, as Sir George truly remarks, defended by Berlioz and other writers. M. E. Deldevez, in his "Curiosités Musicales," published in 1873, alludes to the matter, and it may be interesting to sum up very briefly his arguments in favour of retaining the bars. By way of external evidence he adduces the fact that from the time of the publication of the Symphony to the death of Beethoven (eighteen years) the work was often performed in the composer's presence without any remark from him. "Tradition," says M. Deldevez, "proves that on this matter Beethoven changed his opinion." With regard to internal evidence, our author remarks that, at the outset, Beethoven gives out his theme with legato phrasing; at the repeat, both with tied and with staccato notes. He considers this contrast, evidently intended by the composer, not strong enough in the repeat if the two bars are deleted. The four bars sostenuto, with the two bars staccato by way of echo, lay, he thinks, proper emphasis on the sostenuto in opposition to the pizzicato which soon follows. Further, M. Deldevez is of opinion that the pizzicato phrase up to the a tempo corresponds well in structure with the preceding one, but only if this phrase include the two bars in question.

Not the least interesting feature of Sir George Grove's book is that which refers to the early performances of the Symphonies in England and the criticisms thereupon. It might very naturally be assumed that the Philharmonic Society pioneered these monumental creations; but, as a matter of fact, Beethoven's Symphonies were being frequently played in London some years before the Philharmonic came into existence. Further information on the subject is found in the concert advertisements of the now defunct Morning Chronicle, or, as Beethoven called it, "Morning cronigle." With the necessary preliminary that the first Symphony was first performed (in Vienna) April 2, 1800, and that it was not printed till the end of 1801, we find that so early as May 18, 1803, Mr. Cimador gave a Concert at the Great Rooms, King's Theatre, for which was announced: "A new grand Symphony, never performed in public, Beethoven." This seems to be the first public performance of a Beethoven Symphony in England. The work, which was doubtless "No. 1, in C," was repeated at Raimondi's Concert, June 2, in the same year.

When we come to 1804 we rub our eyes, and wonder whether we are not reading a newspaper of 1894. We find the most interesting fact that a Beethoven Symphony, doubtless "No. 1," was performed no less than five times during the season of 1804! The names of the concert-givers deserve to be recorded. They are: New Musical Fund, Salomon, Harrison, Bolla, and Lemerelle. In the following year, 1805, some Concerts, followed by dancing, were given at the Russell Assembly Rooms, Great Coram Street, Russell Square. For the "Subscription Concert and Ball" of February 14, 1805, there was announced (in the Morning Post) "Grand Symphonie, never performed in this kingdom, Beethoven." This was in all probability the first performance in England of "No. 2, in D." Exactly a year afterwards, February 14, 1806, for one of the "Vocal Concerts," Hanover Square Rooms, there was announced: "Act II. New Grand Sinfonie (MS.) for a Full Band, Beethoven." Was this "New Grand Sinfonie" the "Eroica"? The "MS." qualification makes the probability very strong. The Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge were present at this Concert; and we learn that "during the Second Act" their Royal Highnesses "sat on a seat in the room near the orchestra, and heartily joined in the applause, particularly to a New Grand Symphony, by Beethoven."

So much for the first three of the immortal nine. The date of the first performance in England of the "Pastoral" Sir George has definitely fixed, and that of the "C minor" will no doubt in due time be ascertained. Meanwhile we must add that at Salomon's Concert, April 23, 1801, there was announced: "New Grand Septetto (MS.), Luigi van Beethoven." This favourite work was therefore heard in England almost within a year of its first public performance in Vienna, and, moreover, before it had even been printed. Beethoven sent the score (or parts) to Salomon, as he says, "merely out of friendship, to be performed at his concert." Salomon repeated the work, "By particular desire," on May 27, when it was designated "the new much admired Septetto." "Much admired" is good. We honour the pioneers of Beethoven's music in this country; and the "much admired" sentiment of 1801 we re-echo and fully endorse at the close of the century.

Here are two Wesley stories. The first is told of the elder musician bearing that distinguished patronymic, whose discipleship of J. S. Bach became his second nature. One evening Wesley supped with some congenial spirits. In the small hours of the morning a cab was called to convey him home. Before entering the vehicle, however, "old Sam" persisted in going up to the driver and saying: "Coachman, do you know John Sebastian Bach?" "No, Sir, I don't," replied the Jehu, "but get in, it'll be all right!" The other anecdote concerns Wesley's eminent son, Samuel Sebastian Wesley, between whom and Cathedral dignitaries no love was lost. At one of the Winchester Assizes the judges proceeded up the Cathedral in solemn silence. The Dean, who knew his man, said nothing to Wesley at the time; he waited his opportunity. At the next Assizes he suggested that a voluntary should be played on the organ as the judges advanced along the nave. When the legal procession entered the west door, Wesley put down the low C on the pedals; then he added the stopped diapason on the choir and drew the pedal coupler. In due time (the time was molto adagio) he added tenor C, then the fifth above, and subsequently middle C. By the time the judges were in their places an E flat had been introduced, and the voluntary (!) was finished. Wesley had played the chord of C minor!

The Barnby Memorial Trust Fund now amounts to nearly £700, most of which has been contributed by private friends of the family. It is now the turn of the public to give substantial proof of its estimation of Joseph Barnby's long and faithful ministry to its artistic wants. Energetic efforts are being made, under the direction of Mr. F. R. Spark, Hon. Sec. of the Leeds Musical Festival, to raise a special Yorkshire Barnby Fund; at Cardiff, Mr. Walter Scott, Hon. Sec. of the Musical Festival, is organising one for the South Wales district; and a considerable sum will without doubt be collected among the professors and students of the Guildhall School of Music, all of whom will certainly wish to show their appreciation of the late Principal's work, which was undoubtedly the main cause of the present enormous development of the School.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

"Faint heart never won fair lady," nor even a prodigious pianist. Chicago University is not faint-hearted. It is trying to engage Paderewski for the Conservatory of Music!

Calvé, according to an American paper, hates London, and is credited with saying: "Not for the crown of England, and all the wealth the country contains, would I consent to live in London. Ten times rather would I be a peasant, with a little cottage on the slope of the Apennines and the beautiful sunshine of Italy all about me." How sweet! O these prime donne!

"Woodeny" is an adjective contributed to the limited terminology of musical criticism by an American writer. The sentence in which it occurs stands thus: "The playing of Mr. Evans was a bit woodeny, though his relative values were exact." I don't profess to understand the passage as a whole, but the new word, though not lovely, may be useful.

Frau Lilli Lehmann has given a handsome testimonial to the musical critics of the States. She says: "But there are among critics some who are artists, and this I learned to know specially in America; there critics publicly thank an artist for what he has taught them, and this has compelled my cordial esteem for the critics in question." Surely my American colleagues are proud men this day!

Some maliciously inventive person has started the story, in America, that when Miss Dahl, playing at a Sauret Concert, substituted one of Chopin's Ballades for the advertised Sonata in B minor, certain of the big dailies (Chicago) carefully criticised her rendering of the piece she did not perform. To this a musical journal adds another story:

Apropos of the above, how well I remember when the music critic of a certain big newspaper here (there are not many, so the choice is limited) was first given his appointment. He walked into a well-known music store, and said: "Here, I've just been told to do music work on that —— paper. Give me all the books you have about it!"

With all respect to my colleague, the musical critic of the Freeman's Journal, I must ask him to reconsider his opinion of the leading theme in the first movement of Beethoven's Sonata in G for pianoforte and violin. He writes: "The theme is the cheapest and most trivial. One would not think it out of place in, say, the 'Shop Girl.' Yet it is so treated, and embellished, and embroidered, and variated in and out, in fragments and altogether, fast and slow, that one can call it great music." All that the writer says of the treatment is true, but surely the graceful and pleasant subject is above any kind of association with the "Shop Girl." I suggest this as a point of critical propriety.

The first musical article of a new editor is always interesting, and I am indebted to a correspondent who has sent me an example from a small town in the South of England. How well the writer has entered upon his critical task may be estimated if I make a few extracts. "Nothing," says he, "is better calculated to tax the powers of a chorus than German compositions. The interpreter is lost in a maze of emotion, swayed to and fro, tossed up and down by a sea of contending tremors." After this auspicious beginning, I read: "The interpretation was exceptionally fine, the choir keeping their voices in subdued suspense, while the band, striking off the pizzicato notes, was heard with telling distinctness. Directly afterwards the chorus, gathering power, rises in one united wave of sound to the topmost note, where, blending with the band's prolonged harmonic, it gently dies away." Once more: "The relentlessness of denunciation, the quaking tones of irreparable loss, the abandon in the pleadings, accompanied by sustained flights to the higher notes, elicited," &c. Londoners are generally of opinion that life in the country is dull, but our provincial friends evidently possess more sources of amusement than we wot of.

India is a long way off, no doubt, but nuisances have a habit of spreading with wonderful rapidity, and we must not regard ourselves as quite safe from the musical perambulator which, according to a newspaper paragraph, has been made for an Indian prince. With this peril ahead, our legislators had better vote urgency for the Street Noises Bill. Perambulators are bad enough already, owing to the gregariousness of their habits, and their fondness for rolling along the pavements three or four abreast. One endures them, of course, for the sake of sleeping innocence; but perambulators grinding out "O hush thee, my Baby," are quite another matter, and it may be well to forestall the action of what the Daily Graphic calls "an exasperated adult population."

For some time past the "parochial mind" has not done much to amuse us, and, till the other day, there was reason to fear the disappearance, or, at any rate, the weakening, of that peculiar institution. But the parochial mind was only slumbering, for we now learn that its wonted energy had ample manifestation at Blackburn early in the past month. This naturally took place at a vestry meeting, in the course of which a churchwarden reported that the organist had resigned in order to take a place permitting greater liberty in his choice of music. The parochial officer feelingly, though somewhat obscurely, added that "this was to lose the value of his soul," continuing more plainly with the remark that their next organist must be an "out-and-out Christian." Another churchwarden backed up his fellow, remarking that organists generally were not Christians, and seeming to indicate his belief that a man's Christianity is in inverse proportion to his musical culture. This is pitiable, and I would reason with the churchwardens if it were of any use. What says Jeremy Taylor?—"It is impossible to make people understand their ignorance, for it requires knowledge to perceive it, and, therefore, he that can perceive it hath it not."

A recent number of the Music Trade Review (New York) contains astonishing information about the Tabernacle organ in Salt Lake City. I knew that instrument eleven years ago, and was permitted to "touch" it, but since then it appears to have undergone a transformation into something absolutely unique. My New York contemporary declares that the organ now contains 2,704 pipes, "each thirty-two feet long, and large enough to admit the body of a man of ordinary size." There is an instrument for you! Its gigantic monotone must shake the neighbouring mountains to their base, and rouse every grisly in the Sierra Nevada. Funnily enough, the next paragraph in the Review begins: "Mistakes will happen. Even editors are not infallible." No, indeed!

The Melbourne Leader complains that music is badly supported in Australian cities, and seeks to justify itself by quoting figures which, if correct, are convincing. The Sydney Philharmonic recently performed Massenet's "Mary Magdalene" to a house worth only £22. The same Society spent £225 on a Good Friday Concert and received but £215, while the engagement of an English quartet party produced no more than £287 to set against an outlay of £401. There was a profit of £54 on the Christmas "Messiah," but the year ended with a loss of £154. The difficulty lies in public unwillingness to pay high prices, and the thing to do is to convince Concert-goers in the "under-world" that some music is worth more than five shillings.

"The chorus then rose," says a Montreal paper, noticing a performance of Haydn's "Imperial" Mass, "and placed body and soul into the Mass, and, with the exception of a few accidentals on the part of the chorus, everything went well. . . . In the contralto a deepness was found, though her expressions were fine . . . whilst the deep-toned notes of the basso resounded with might. . . . The various parts of the orchestra were performed in a masterly way." It used to be a matter of complaint that the vocabulary of criticism was unduly limited, but the present tendency is quite in another direction apparently.

A Staffordshire paper states that Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony was recently performed in its district, and then goes on to describe the "Farewell" of the same master. It also says that Mozart's Symphony in E flat and Beethoven's in A were played by a violin, violoncello, and pianoforte. Something wrong somewhere.

There is an outcry in New York professional circles against amateur organists, who are said to be putting down the professionals from their seats. Out of thirty churches reported, twenty are served by amateurs, or "one-legged organists," as the Musical Age calls them, because they mostly pedal with the left foot only. Can it be that the New York churchwardens agree with their brethren in Blackburn and hold that no cultured musician can be a Christian? or is it that amateurs are cheaper? Thirty years ago I wrote an article in the Sunday Times headed "Agressive Amateurism." It was sufficiently pessimistic, but did not at all foreshadow the pass at which the unlucky professional has now arrived.

In connection with a performance of the "Hymn of Praise" by the Loughton Choral Society, under Mr. Henry Riding, a laudable effort was made, through the local press, to inform and interest the public in the work. Much might be done in this way, and conductors especially should make a point, with editorial concurrence, of preparing their audience for the music about to be performed. Their remarks would fail if too technical, but something in the nature of a popular description of the subject and of such salient features as all can observe and, with help, appreciate might be trusted to have a good effect. I note, by the way, an error in one of the Loughton articles, which says that the Choral was, according to tradition, sung by Luther "on his way to the stake." Luther did not undergo the ordeal of fire, and, probably, the writer had in mind the singing of "Ein feste Burg" as the Reformer entered Worms to present himself before the Diet.

A new "Christus," the work of M. Adolphe Samuel, has been produced in Brussels, and favourably judged. It is a choral symphony in five divisions, the first four of which chiefly contain orchestral music, while, in the last, voices are largely employed. The Belgian Times states that the "Christus" will be looked after, in England, by Messrs. Novello and Co.

Gounod reduced the first of Bach's Forty-eight Preludes to the position of an accompaniment for one of his own melodies, and, according to the Freeman's Journal, Papini has arranged this arrangement for nine violins, two harps, and organ. Here we have a lesson in the generation of mistakes.

"The Chariot Race" is the name of a pianoforte piece published in America, and advertised with a description of its "argument." I make an extract:

Past pillar and post; past fair women, and men of high renown, the chariots whirl in great but terrible splendour. Once around the course! Faster and faster they fly; and louder and louder become the cheers, entreaties and execrations of the multitude. Hark! Crash! Down goes an intrepid but careless rider. The awe-stricken silence is only momentary, however, for the goal is in sight. On! On! On! The loosened rein, the hissing of the many-folded lashes, the frenzied cries of the multitude, all seem to find expression in the closing "furioso" bars; and the race is won in a glorious climax to a splendid piece of work.

And yet people smile at the "Battle of Prague!"

A Frankfort correspondent of the Musical Courier sends the following remarks to that journal:

Three English songs were sung by Miss Orridge, of London, who possesses a strong voice of good quality and wide range. The pieces sung were more than commonly interesting, being the work of a young English student, Mr. Norman O'Neill, of London, who is studying at the Conservatory under Herr Professor Knorr. The group given is unpublished, but should not remain so. The songs are entitled "A Little Boy Lost," "Parted," "Lullaby," this last being a musical setting to Eugene Field's tender poem, the "Norse Lullaby." Each of the group of songs is worthy of the master of this student; they are tuneful, fully and beautifully worked out in all parts, and finished in polished style. This young man has something to say in the world of tone, and he is saying it forcibly and sympathetically, and will before long speak to more of the world, in higher planes, no doubt.

I hope to hear more, in the same strain, of this young composer.

Joseph Bennett.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

This admirably equipped association cannot complain of any want of patronage, notwithstanding the decease of its revered conductor, Sir Joseph Barnby. There were immense attendances both at the usual Good Friday rendering of "The Messiah," with Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Clara Butt, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Santley as the principal vocalists; and of the jubilee performance of "Elijah," on the 23rd ult. This was the first of several performances announced in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the production of Mendelssohn's immortal masterpiece at the Birmingham Festival in 1846, an event memorable indeed in the annals of music in England. "Elijah" at once took root in the affections of amateurs in this country, and when the fastidious composer had pruned his score and made sundry additions the oratorio was accepted as a perfect work of art, and this judgment has never been called into question. Indeed, "Elijah" still ranks second only to "The Messiah" among oratorios. Its performance, under the direction of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, was quite worthy of the prestige of the Albert Hall Choir. The principal vocalists—all well fitted for their duties—were Misses Ella Russell, Maggie Purvis, L. Dews, Edmée de Dreux, and Messrs. Lloyd Chandos, J. A. Bovett, and Andrew Black.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The Society's third Concert, given at Queen's Hall on the 22nd ult., began with Beethoven's glorious Symphony in A, in many parts of which the playing of the band lacked point and even neatness. Sir A. C. Mackenzie devoted unsparing energy to the task of counteracting the listlessness of his little army; but for some inexplicable reason they would not interest themselves in their work, and it was only towards the end that some portion of the conductor's vitality seemed to reach them. Only two or three performers seemed to escape the general somnolency—among them all honour to the second horn, who played his beautiful part in the Scherzo like an intelligent artist. Saint-Saëns's fourth Concerto is clever and effective, like all this composer's works, but its emotional contents are meagre. Madame Sophie Menter made the most of the opportunities afforded by the work for brilliant display, her wonderfully perfect technique enabling her to conceal the difficulty of the most formidable passages. She acknowledged four recalls, but wisely declined the encore so persistently demanded. The remaining instrumental pieces were Vieuxtemps's Concerto in D minor (No. 4), played with perfect skill and taste by Mr. Johannes Wolff, and the "Tannhäuser" Overture, which is now fast becoming hackneyed. Mr. Bispham sang Wagner's setting of Heine's "Two Grenadiers" (the accompaniment of which had been scored for orchestra with much skill and imaginative power by Mr. Clarence Lucas) and, in place of "Per questa bella mano," originally announced, the immortal "Non più andrai," both with the success that such finished and intelligent art as his always commands. At the next Concert Mr. Cowen's new Suite, "In Fairyland," will be played for the first time, and Mr. Eugene d'Albert will play Liszt's E flat Concerto.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

Mr. Herbert Bunning, whose "Village Suite" was performed at the Concert of the 4th ult., is no stranger to the Sydenham audiences—an Idyl for strings and horn and a scena for baritone and orchestra having already figured in the programmes of the Saturday series. The new work, which is in four movements, is a realistic attempt to record the impressions of country life in Italy, and though it suffers from the common fault of excessive sonority and a somewhat sophisticated sentiment, shows considerable command of orchestral resource and an instinct for picturesque though rather highly-coloured effects. Mr. Bunning's peasants, in short, are lacking in rural simplicity, and somewhat suggestive of the stage variety. The first movement, entitled "Pastorale," opens charmingly, and the "Peasants' Dance" is a bright, spirited, and engaging number. The sentiment of the "Idyl" is rather strained, and the Finale, in which Mr. Bunning gives us literally all the fun of the fair, is overcrowded with detail. It remains to be added that Mr. Bunning's work was capitally performed under Mr. Manns's direction, and that the composer was called to the platform to bow his acknowledgments. Miss Jessie Grimson, a scholar of the Royal College and member of an exceptionally gifted family of instrumentalists, made her début at these Concerts in Spohr's familiar "Scena Cantante," and by her elegant phrasing, accurate intonation, and fluent execution fully deserved the warm reception accorded to her by audience and orchestra. The orchestral numbers performed included Beethoven's Second Symphony, admirably played; Halvorsen's "Triumphal entry of the Boyards," a showy piece of musical pageantry; and Goldmark's clever "Im Frühling" Overture. The vocalists were Miss Mabel Berrey and Mr. Braxton Smith, who were associated in the duet "Dear love of mine," from Goring Thomas's "Nadeshda," besides contributing solos.

The remarkable advance in delicacy and refinement which has been achieved of late years by M. Sapellnikoff was conspicuously displayed in his admirable interpretation of the solo of Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto at the Concert of the 11th ult. It was sympathetic in spirit, brilliant in execution, and altogether enjoyable. M. Sapellnikoff gave great pleasure later on by his poetical rendering of Tschaïkowsky's "Song without Words" in F, Mendelssohn's "Spinning Song," and wound up with a fine exhibition of virtuosity in Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in A (No. 13). The familiar beauties of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony were brought home to the audience in a very fine performance of that ever-welcome masterpiece, and the band also distinguished itself in the Overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute" and Dvorák's richly coloured and romantic "In der Natur" Overture. Miss Alice Esty sang with her wonted charm of expression Félicien David's "Thou brilliant bird"—in which the flute obbligato was irreproachably played by Mr. Fransella—and Gomez's "Mia Piccirella," but her voice and style are imperfectly adapted to songs of the bravura type.

There was but a scanty audience at the concluding Concert of the series, on the 18th ult., football and not music being responsible for the tremendous crowds which flocked to the Crystal Palace on that afternoon. The faithful few, however, were rewarded by hearing a new work of considerable force and interest in Christian Sinding's Symphony in D minor. Strenuous energy is perhaps its dominant characteristic. Indeed, Herr Sinding may be said to possess the defects of his qualities, for the work is decidedly wanting in dynamic relief. The scoring, though not exactly "thick," is so continuously sonorous throughout the whole of the first movement as to beget a certain fatigue. There is also a good deal of otiose repetition of phrases, nor can it be admitted that the composer's studied violations of the elementary rules of harmony are justified by the results, which are often more curious than convincing. Still, with all drawbacks, the work commands respect and even admiration by its breadth and boldness of outline and its entire avoidance of the commonplace or sensational, and its repetition may be looked for with pleasurable anticipation. Mr. Mark Hambourg played with remarkable vigour and skill, but a superfluity of gesture, the solo of Rubinstein's Pianoforte Concerto in D and solos by Liszt and Leschetizky; Miss Evangeline Florence revived a charming air by Veracini, "arranged" by "A. L.," and songs by Cowen; and the programme was completed by the orchestral arrangement of the closing scene from "Rheingold" and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in F.

LAMOUREUX CONCERTS.

The famous Parisian orchestra, organised and conducted by M. Lamoureux, made its first appearance in England on Monday, the 13th ult., when the first of three Concerts at Queen's Hall was given before a large and highly appreciative audience. The programme consisted of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture, Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, the Overture to Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," the Pilgrim's March from Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Saint-Saëns's "Rouet d'Omphale," and Wagner's "Huldigungsmarsch." It will be obvious that for successful renderings of so varied a selection of pieces every quality necessary to a first-rate orchestra must be forthcoming, and on the whole the Lamoureux band emerged with wonderful success from the ordeal. We should have liked more breadth and freedom in the phrasing of the first movement of the C minor, the "Huldigungsmarsch," and the quick portions of the "Flying Dutchman" Overture; more "brutality" of emphasis in the "curse" motive of the Overture and the "first subject" of the C minor; and in its plaintive, pleading "second subject" less rigidity of tempo; but in every other respect the interpretations were beyond praise.

In order that the precise nature of the merits shown should be clearly understood, the constitution of the Lamoureux orchestra and the conditions under which it works must be indicated. The personnel consists solely of players of the highest rank, every member being either the holder of a Premier Prix from the Paris Conservatoire or the occupant of an official musical post; and these artists, by constantly practising together under the same chief and by means of rehearsals, numerous and sectional to a degree that English musicians would regard as ridiculously in excess of actual needs, have so learnt to play together that, in execution, phrasing, balance of tone, and relationship of parts to the whole, something very near perfection has been attained. Without being exactly a "great" conductor as regards sympathy, insight, and inspiration, M. Lamoureux is master of that "art of taking pains" which has been spoken of as identical with "genius." He possesses, also, that power of compelling obedience—of making himself at once loved and feared—that forms the necessary equipment of every born leader of men. We have, therefore, in the Lamoureux orchestra an instrument able to carry out the slightest indications of its chief with a thoroughness, an attention to detail, and a unanimity of intention surpassing anything hitherto heard in this country. Among special features that commanded instant admiration may be named the wonderful delicacy of the pianissimos obtained (especially from the strings), the refined phrasing of the "wood-wind," the splendid volume of tone given out by the double basses, and the absolute homogeneity which reigned throughout the orchestra with regard to intonation. It is doubtful whether a band so perfectly "in tune" had ever previously been heard in London.

The programme quoted above was repeated on Tuesday in Manchester and on Wednesday in Liverpool, the band returning to Euston at two o'clock on Thursday. At a rehearsal held at Queen's Hall an hour or two later, M. Lamoureux addressed his orchestra, calling upon them to give three hearty "English" cheers for Mr. Robert Newman, not only for having made their visit possible and altogether pleasant, but for his successful efforts to establish the French pitch in England. Frenchmen were accustomed to speak of the English people as cold. How ill-founded was this opinion the heartiness of their reception here had amply proved. At the second London Concert, given on the Thursday evening, the programme consisted of Saint-Saëns's Symphony in C minor, with organ and pianoforte obbligati, composed for the Philharmonic Society in 1886, the Overture to "Die Meistersinger," the "Forest Music" from "Siegfried," the Hungarian March from Berlioz's "Faust," and two works not previously heard here—Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein's Camp" and the Serenade from G. Charpentier's Suite "Impressions d'Italie." Both works are melodious and pleasing, and as such will be heard again with pleasure. Except that M. Lamoureux's reading of the "Meistersinger" Overture was curiously heavy and wanting in humour, the performances of these works left absolutely nothing to be desired. On Friday, the programme of the first Concert was repeated at Brighton at a morning Concert given in the Dome, and on Saturday, the 18th ult., the week's work (a pretty heavy one!) ended with the third Queen's Hall Concert, given before an overflowing audience. The pieces included the second portion of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, the "Chasse et Orage" from his opera "Les Troyens," the Good Friday music from "Parsifal," two light pieces by Bizet and Delibes, and Balakireff's symphonic poem "Tamara," which, though not without merit, is little likely to be heard again and need therefore not detain us here. At the close of the Concert the French orchestra rose with military precision and played "God save the Queen," after which the audience cheered them again and again. It is pleasant to know that Mr. Robert Newman has already arranged to bring M. Lamoureux and his men to Queen's Hall again in November.

ROYAL ARTILLERY BAND CONCERTS.

The fine band conducted by Cavaliere L. Zavertal at Queen's Hall, on March 27, offered a very attractive programme representative of several schools. The Symphony was that belonging to the "Lobgesang," and in each of the beautiful movements the closest observance of light and shade was manifested. The Allegro was played with all needful spirit, whilst the devotional feeling characterising the Adagio was admirably reflected throughout. The Overtures to Schumann's "Genoveva" and Mancinelli's "Cleopatra" were brightly executed, as also were two stirring excerpts from Kretschmer's opera "Die Folkunger" (dating from 1875) and the first of Dvorák's vigorous Slavonic Dances. Exceptional delicacy was displayed in Saint-Saëns's "Rêverie du Soir," from the "Suite Algérienne," and in Mdlle. Chaminade's "La Chaise à Porteurs." But nothing proved more successful than the dainty "Valse Mélancolique" ("Lonely Life") and the energetic "Allegro di Bravura" ("The Dance"), from Mr. Edward German's "Gipsy" Suite. These engaging pieces received such justice from the band that the demands for a repetition of the second-named did not cease until they were acceded to. The gratification occasioned by both numbers was as great as when this popular Suite was performed in its entirety under the same direction a few months back.

Slavonic composers were in the ascendant on the 17th ult. Dvorák held the place of honour with the Symphony "From the New World," and Smetana's brisk Overture, "Prodaná Nevesta," brought the Concert to a conclusion. The Symphony, with its pleasant reminiscences of melodies associated with "the plantation," went well from beginning to end, the more delicate points of the Largo being quite as felicitously developed as was the joyous excitement pervading the Scherzo. This work has never been better rendered in the metropolis. The March from Barnby's "Rebekah," the expressive Adagietto of Bizet's "L'Arlésienne" Suite (in which a perfect pianissimo was produced), the Gavotte from Godard's opera "Jocelyn," the ballet music from Rubinstein's "The Demon," two of Grieg's piquant "Norwegian Dances," and Glinka's "Komarinskaja" (Hochzeitslied and Tanzlied) were also included in the list of pieces in which Cavaliere Zavertal and his talented force fully sustained the reputation long since honourably won. With unhackneyed selections in every respect efficiently performed, it is not surprising that the Royal Artillery Band Concerts should be so warmly appreciated.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

These entertainments terminated, as usual, on the Monday in Holy Week, which this year came on March 30. We have, therefore, only to deal briefly with the last two Concerts of the season. At the final Saturday performance, on March 28, a most effective rendering was given of Beethoven's magnificent Pianoforte Trio in B flat (Op. 97), by Miss Fanny Davies and Messrs. Joachim and Piatti, and Brahms's early String Sextet in B flat (Op. 18) opened the scheme, which included three of the same composer's Hungarian Dances for violin and pianoforte and Mendelssohn's "Tema con Variazioni" for pianoforte and violoncello in D (Op. 17). Mrs. Hutchinson was the vocalist. The final performance, on the date already named, was very largely attended, not a surprising fact, as the programme was exceptionally attractive. It commenced with Mendelssohn's Octet in E flat for strings (Op. 20), one of the most marvellous emanations of youthful musical genius ever penned. It was splendidly interpreted by Mr. Joachim and the artists with whom he was associated, and similar remarks will apply to the performances of Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins and Schumann's glorious Pianoforte Quintet in E flat (Op. 44), with which so many seasons of these Concerts have concluded. Mr. Leonard Borwick was the pianist on this occasion and was, of course, encored after rendering two charming trifles by the Russian composer Rachmaninoff. Mr. David Bispham sang airs by Purcell, Schumann, Verdi, and Henschel to perfection, and so in the most agreeable manner the thirty-eighth season of Mr. Arthur Chappell's Concerts came to an end.

DRURY LANE OPERA.

"Opera in English" is gradually but surely establishing itself among us, and, thanks to Sir Augustus Harris, has this year more than ever established its claims to the respect of music-lovers. The merits of the performances inaugurated at Drury Lane, on the 4th ult., are considerably in excess of those usually put forward during the "off" season (when, of course, theatre prices are charged), and the répertoire includes works that, a few years ago, would have been regarded as hopelessly "over the heads" of those to whom opera in the vernacular is more particularly supposed to appeal. The excellence of the performance has been greatly due to the orchestra, which is composed of the best material, and is presided over by Mr. Mancinelli as conductor-in-chief, and Mr. J. M. Glover, Mr. Feld, and Mr. Landon Ronald as assistants. The opening night was devoted to "Faust," with Madame Moody, Mr. Hedmondt, and Mr. Manners in the three chief characters, and an exceedingly promising young baritone, Mr. Wilson Sheffield, as Valentine. With the assistance of the artists already named, and Miss Pauline Joran (an excellent Carmen and Nedda), Madame Duma, Miss Lilian Tree, Miss Elba, Miss Jessie Huddleston, and Messrs. David Bispham, Philip Brozel, Copland, R. Green, Brophy, and Bevan, excellent performances have been given of "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Cavalleria," "Hansel und Gretel," "Carmen," "Maritana," and the "Bohemian Girl."

GOOD FRIDAY CONCERTS.

The Queen's Hall Choral Society gave a good performance of "The Redemption," a work that yearly increases in favour as a suitable production for the Lenten season. The choruses were sung with exceptional precision and verve, none of the more dramatic points being missed, whilst in the Sanhedrim scene the denunciation, "For ages on your head shall contempt be outpoured," was delivered with a clearness, force, and intensity as startling as it was convincing. The freshness of the juvenile voices in the choir imparted special effect to the beautiful chorus "From Thy love as a Father" and to the massive "Unfold, ye portals." The solos obtained efficient interpretation from Madame Marie Duma, Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Ludwig (to whom was assigned the music of the Saviour), and Messrs. Iver McKay and David Bispham. The band earned hearty commendation. Mr. Edwin H. Lemare was at the organ, and Mr. Randegger conducted with his accustomed judgment.

At St. James's Hall the South London Choral Association secured applause for a firm and feeling rendering of Mendelssohn's noble Psalm "Judge me, O God," of "O Gladsome Light" (Sullivan's "Golden Legend"), and of oratorio excerpts, Mr. L. C. Venables ably conducting. Miss Ella Russell sang Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" with devotional fervour, and the other soloists included Madame Hope Glenn, Miss Stanley Lucas, Messrs. Iver McKay and Foli. Mr. H. R. Rose played a couple of organ solos and Mr. Henry Bird was the accompanist.

At Queen's Hall in the evening a programme of miscellaneous sacred pieces was carried through by Miss Macintyre (heard to advantage in "Angels ever bright and fair"), Madame Belle Cole, Misses Hilda Wilson, Maud Sherman, and Grace Woodward, and Messrs. Henry Piercy and Bispham. Instrumental contributions were supplied by Miss Louise Nanney (violin) and Mr. W. S. Hoyte (organ).

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

On Wednesday evening, March 25, two acts of Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro" were given, in praiseworthy fashion, by students of the Tenterden Street Institution; but of course efforts of this nature, presented merely to invited guests, are not open to minute criticism. On Tuesday afternoon, however, the 31st of the same month, the usual terminal public Concert took place in St. James's Hall, and was unusually successful in an artistic sense. The commendation must be bestowed chiefly on individual students, as the programme did not include any work of a symphonic nature, though Sir Alexander Mackenzie had under his command a hundred well drilled orchestral pupils, nearly half of whom were of the gentler sex. The principal instrumental pieces were Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in D (No. 2), excellently played, as to the solo part, by Mr. Claude F. Pollard (Thalberg Scholar), and Rubinstein's brilliant Pianoforte Concerto in G (Op. 45), rendered with all needful energy by Miss Marguerite Elzy (Erard Centenary Scholar). Miss Edith Byford and Miss Daisy Hansell (violinists), Miss May Mukle (violoncellist), and Miss J. Spicer, Miss Isabel Jay, and Mr. F. Baring Ranalow (vocalists) may all be encouraged to persevere with their studies.

The competition for the Norman Salmond Prize (limited to Yorkshire students) took place on March 30. The examiner (Miss Hilda Wilson) awarded the prize to Sarah A. Gomersall and commended Kate Somerset. The competition for the Sterndale Bennett Prize took place on the 16th ult. The prize was awarded to Lily West, and the examiners highly commended Isabel Coates and Florence Dawes.

THE SOCIETY OF ARTS.

A paper of considerable interest, entitled "Early English Organ Writers," was read by Mr. Burnham Horner, on the 15th ult., at the Society of Arts. Mr. Horner briefly reviewed the writings and peculiarities of a long list of musicians who had written for this instrument, the chief names mentioned being Orlando Gibbons, Henry Purcell, Handel, John Reading, Dr. Maurice Greene, Thomas Kelway, Jacob Kirkman, John James (who materially assisted Dr. Burney in his "History of Music"), John Travers, Henry Heron, William and Starling Goodwin, William Walond, Henry Burgess, Charles Avison, William Boyce, John Keeble (Organist of St. George's, Hanover Square, and the Ranelagh Gardens), John Stanley, Dr. Nares, Dr. Worgan (who enjoyed great popularity as a performer at the Vauxhall Gardens), Dr. Philip Hayes, James Hook (a notorious punster), C. F. Baumgarten (1754-1824), "to whom may be ascribed the first printed music with three staves"; Samuel and Charles Wesley, Dr. Crotch, Thomas Adams (a famous extemporaneous player), Jonas Blewett (compiler of one of the first treatises on organ playing), and John Whitaker, beyond whom the lecturer did not go. In conclusion, Mr. Horner said:—

"I have endeavoured to point out how enormous was Handel's influence over our composers, warping their minds and limiting their progress. Is it not so, in a large measure, in the present day? Is not everyone trying his best to go beyond his power to imitate a colossal genius like Wagner? Fortunately, there are some organ writers who strike out a line of their own, and there are some native composers who can measure their length with such foreign writers as Merkel, Widor, or Rheinberger. It is unfortunate that the general public is, to a great extent, disinterested in organ music. We have the best performers in the world, and our instruments can compare most favourably with other countries. One reason may be that it is not an easily accessible instrument; the other, that it demands very great labour on the part of the performer; it is also an instrument that exercises nerve power to a large extent. A pupil of mine was once practising by herself, the bellows being blown by a half-witted boy. Well, this lady was much troubled over a hymn-tune she was practising, and after much stumbling, a head popped round the corner, and the simple-minded boy said, 'You do not seem to get on well with that toon, mum. Could you do it better, if I was to whistle it over to you fust?'"

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. W. C. Banister was the contributor of the paper at the monthly meeting, on the 14th ult., of the Musical Association. The title of the discourse was "Music viewed from different standpoints," and its object may be described as a plea for tolerance of the opinions of others and a more comprehensive view of musical art. Mr. Banister dismissed the non-musician as one who formed his opinions by a mere glance from the one standpoint of a striking impression; but musicians were divided into many classes, of which the most distinct were the pedantic, the traditional, the comparative, the analytical, the vocal, and others whose judgments were biassed by prejudices and idiosyncrasies. In a happy simile the lecturer compared the art to a stately cathedral, the beauties of which, to be duly appreciated, must be viewed from many standpoints, both without and within. There was also much truth in the remark that we lost much enjoyment by ceaseless comparison of one work with another, even when they were by the same composer. From this cause also many early works suffered unmerited neglect. Speaking to the pedantic, the lecturer prettily said: "Theory, rules, grammar must be . . . but who of us will parse a love-letter that comes to us, and a composer speaks to us from his heart." Rules were not for musicians any more than the moral law was for the well-behaved, not that he would imply that students were always misbehaved. In conclusion, he asked his listeners to abandon all individual standpoints and to be slow to reject even that with which they had no sympathy. Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, who occupied the chair, warmly supported Mr. Banister's views, and, in fact, so much harmony prevailed that there was practically no discussion.

TWO NORTHERN MUSICAL FESTIVALS.

From year to year we have had to record the advances made by the annual music Competitions and Festivals held at Kendal, under Miss Wakefield's guidance. This year the "Wakefield" Festivals have received the sincere flattery of imitation, and the neighbouring County of Cumberland has begun a friendly rivalry by instituting a Festival of its own, on very similar lines. The Kendal meeting, which took place on the 14th, 15th, and 16th ult., showed some wholesome development. The number of entries was larger than ever. There were twenty-nine more choirs taking part than at the 1895 Festival, and the number of individuals competing came up in the aggregate to no less than 1,177. The first day was given up to youthful competitors. As usual, the sight-singing—always an important feature on these occasions—was remarkably good, though perhaps the highest level was reached in the adult competition on the third day, when the young lady who received the first prize sang correctly the most difficult test the judge, Mr. McNaught, was able to put before her. In the solo competition fourteen singers under sixteen years old sang Sullivan's "Birds in the Night," the majority singing with a refined feeling that older singers might have envied. The winner of the first prize, Marion Titterington, had all the charm of childlike unconsciousness together with genuine artistic expression. The juvenile choirs and the two-part sight reading also produced some excellent results. The day's proceedings were wound up with a Concert, in which all the choirs united in a performance of Facer's children's cantata "Red Riding-Hood's Reception," under Miss Wakefield's conductorship, the soloists being all children, of whom Amy Prill and C. Hudson deserve especial mention. The zest with which the tuneful choruses were sung was quite delightful. The second day was for vocal soloists and instrumentalists. The judges in the former branch were Miss Lucy Broadwood and Mr. George Murray, and Miss Broadwood added to the value of the adjudications by the helpful remarks she volunteered on the singing. The tenors and basses were strikingly good, and those who went expecting some amusement at rustic attempts to sing so difficult an air as "O ruddier than the cherry" were disappointed. As for the tenors, it need only be recorded that they elicited a compliment on the score of modesty and absence of self-consciousness to prove that they were not of the ordinary type. The instrumental competitions, of which Mr. Henry Bird was the judge, furnished a new departure. Considering the "long felt want" of a more extended practice and greater appreciation of orchestral music in this country, the establishment of a class for "village orchestras" was a most interesting experiment. It was a decided success, three little bands appearing to play two Bourrées by Handel. The first prize went to Sedbergh, for a performance characterised by remarkable neatness and delicacy, while the Windermere band came in a good second, playing the pieces set with capital tone and force. The subjects of the string quartet and pianoforte trio competitions were perhaps not quite as happily chosen with a view to testing the ensemble of the players as might be. The former was a Minuet and Trio by Mozart, the latter, the well known "Gipsy Rondo," from Haydn's first Trio, and the performances showed that both works had been assiduously rehearsed by the amateurs who took part. The evening of the second day was taken up with a Concert that might be regarded as a dress rehearsal of that of the following night, and does not call for detailed notice. It proved much more popular than when the plan was first adopted a year ago, and the hall was well filled. The busiest of all the three days was the last, when the adult choirs had their turn, and there were no less than sixty-three entries in the five classes, beside the sight singing for individuals. The singing of the female choirs called forth warm praise from the judge, Mr. McNaught, on the score of enunciation. As he amusingly put it, a special prize of £2 for enunciation had been awarded, and all Kendal and district had been working hard for good enunciation, which showed how cheaply that quality could be got. In the male-voice choirs the excellence of the "blend," a difficult thing to obtain, was conspicuous in the best of the competitors. The next class was for choirs from the small villages of the district, a restriction that gives the small populations a chance. Farrant's anthem, "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake," was sung with varying degrees of technical perfection, but with a very general appreciation of the dignity of the music and a careful avoidance of all fussiness or exaggeration of expression. In the Village Choral Societies' Class each choir was to be prepared to sing any portion of Gluck's "Orpheus," chosen by the judge on the day, and in addition to go through a simple exercise in four-part sight reading, so that the test was as thorough as could be devised, and involved much more general musicianship than is required for the mere preparation of a set piece. In former years the chief prizes were won by the greatest aggregate of marks, but on this occasion the prizes for the test piece and for the sight singing were kept entirely separate, a change the wisdom of which may be questioned. The interest of the event culminated in this last competition and that which followed, the Leslie Madrigal competition, for which a challenge shield is awarded. An almost cruelly severe test was afforded in Benet's "Flow, oh my tears," and it brought forth some remarkably good performances. When the extreme difficulty of singing a sustained pianissimo in unaccompanied music is borne in mind, the success of the Sedbergh choir in obtaining fifty-six marks out of a possible sixty was a wonderful achievement. Nor was it only technically good, but the tender melancholy of the piece was exactly caught. After the sight reading, to which reference has already been made, the Festival ended with a Concert, the first part consisting of Gluck's "Orpheus," given with judicious cuts. The soloists were the Countess Valda Gleichen, Miss Evangeline Florence, and Miss Lindsay Currie; while in the miscellaneous second part Miss Wakefield and Mr. Kennerley Rumford also sang solos. Between the parts the prizes were given away by Countess Bective, who took the place of Sir John Stainer. The result of the Novello Prize, for the greatest aggregate of marks in all classes, was announced, Sedbergh and Windermere having in the event to share this important distinction. Miss Wakefield conducted the Concert with characteristic energy and ability, and, as the ruling spirit of the event, may be heartily congratulated upon the success of the eleventh year of these Festivals. That over a thousand persons within a radius of fourteen miles from Kendal should be induced to diligently practise good music of all kinds, cannot but improve their taste as well as their executive powers.

The Carlisle Festival, which took place on the 17th ult., could not be expected to rival its neighbour, being the first of its kind in the district. But it was a promising beginning, and, as regards actual achievement, presented many points of high excellence. The children's choirs showed much room for improvement in expression, intonation, and general musicianly feeling; but the sight singing of a choir of boys from a Carlisle Board School was very satisfactory, as was that of the choir who won the prize in the class for adults, and who sang the test supplied them with almost absolute accuracy. The small number of entries was unfortunate, as in several classes there were "walks over"; but this will doubtless be remedied on a future occasion, as the Festival becomes better known. A church choir gave a reading of Macfarren's anthem "The Lord is my Shepherd" that was in every respect excellent; and the choir of a Congregational Chapel sang Sullivan's "I will sing of Thy power" with admirable force and expression. The difficulty of finding material in small villages was illustrated by the singing of a choir from a small village under Skiddaw, whose enthusiasm got the better of their discretion, and led to some bad tone and defective intonation. In the most important class for choral societies, Bishop's "Fisherman's Good Night" was really admirably sung by the winning choir, the Wetheral and Corby Society, to whom Mr. McNaught awarded no less than fifty-six marks out of a maximum of sixty. In a quartet competition there were only two entries, but both quartets sang Macfarren's "The Miller" with capital force and spirit. The performance of the winners, who also hailed from Wetheral, was characterised by remarkable finish and ease. The Festival ended with a Concert, at which the competing choirs were united and sang several pieces under Mr. McNaught's very expressive conducting, with a force and beauty of tone indicating what fine material exists for a capable chorus in the neighbourhood of Carlisle. The prizes were given away by Miss Wakefield, who was introduced by the Bishop of Carlisle, and whose presence on the occasion had an appropriateness that was very obvious. Certainly the promoters of the Festival, among whom must be singled out Mr. Hodgson as its honorary secretary and originator, have no reason to be discouraged at the result of their first effort, and it is satisfactory to learn that preparations are being made for its repetition a year hence.

THE CHORAL SOCIETIES OF BERLIN.

In a former notice I gave some account of Berlin's musical life; the general character of that account precluded me from dealing at any length with the constitution and achievements of the various choral societies, considered separately.

Choral singing in general is not cultivated to the same extent in Germany as it is in England, and the choirs are in many respects inferior to ours. Too often there is a lack of freshness in the voices, especially the sopranos, and in some choirs it is apparently the rule that no ladies under fifty years of age should be admitted. This is detrimental to a good balance of sound. Another point in which Berlin compares unfavourably with London is that, as a rule, the best vocalists available are not engaged for the solo parts; consequently, in attending the performance of an oratorio, one is frequently compelled to listen to the efforts of more or less inexperienced singers; the fact being that the vocal energy of Germany is almost entirely directed towards the operatic stage. In spite of these and other detractions, there are several choral societies in Berlin which do excellent work and bring a great deal of enthusiasm to bear on their various productions; this is principally due to the excellence of individual conductors, to whom I shall presently refer. Several of the societies have been in existence a great number of years, and it is interesting to observe their progress and the curving line of their reputation. The Sternscher Verein, for instance, was at one time very good indeed, and after a period of slackness is improving again under the untiring care and energy of Professor Friedrich Gernsheim.

The order of things demands that I should first say something of the Singakademie, which is the oldest established institution of the kind in Berlin. It was founded in 1791 by Carl Fasch, a teacher and composer of some reputation at that time, and its original object was the private performance of sacred compositions by Fasch himself. For the first two years the meetings were held at a private house, the original members numbering only twenty-seven. In 1793 a room at the Royal Academy of Arts was granted to the Society for its practices, but it was not until eight years afterwards that regular public performances began to take place; and it was only in 1827 that the building which bears the name of the Society was completed. The Singakademie has exercised an important and most beneficial influence upon the music world of Germany, and has done much to foster the knowledge of Handel's works throughout the country. Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion was first performed in 1829 with Mendelssohn as conductor, and since that date it has been annually given. Fasch, the founder, died in 1800, and it is somewhat remarkable that the conductorship has only changed hands three times since Carl Zelter was appointed at the commencement of the century. The latter was succeeded by Carl Rungenhagen, he by Eduard Grell, who in turn gave place to Martin Blumner. Mendelssohn never held the post of permanent conductor, though an attempt was made to bring it about. The old tradition as to the singing of sacred music only is still adhered to by the Society.

The Sternscher Gesangverein was founded in 1847 by Julius Stern, and "Elijah" was given at the inaugural performance in the October of that year. The list of conductors associated with this Society comprises such well-known names as Stern himself, Stockhausen, Max Bruch, Rudorff, and Gernsheim. The Society is very energetic in the production of modern German works, and amongst those performed, since Professor Gernsheim undertook the direction, may be mentioned Vierling's "Constantia," Max Bruch's "Feuerkreuz," Hegar's "Manasse," and Gernsheim's "Ein Preislied." Brahms's name frequently figures upon the programme, and Verdi's "Requiem" was recently given. The choir numbers, at the present moment, 280, and public performances are given three or four times during the winter.

The Cæcilien Verein, founded in the early sixties, is another important Society; it is under the direction of Herr Alexis Holländer. The three Societies mentioned above are the oldest in Berlin, and have had the greatest influence; but in addition to them must be mentioned the Philharmonic Choir, which, founded as recently as 1884, has, under the able direction of Herr Siegfried Ochs, made a considerable reputation for itself.

Although hardly coming under the denomination of choral societies, since their programmes frequently contain no choral work, one can hardly conclude a review of this kind without a brief allusion to the Wagner Verein and the Symphony Concerts of the Royal Opera Orchestra.

The Berlin Wagner Verein, to judge from one or two recent programmes, exists for the purpose of performing works by any composer other than Wagner; its concerts, however, are frequently of great interest, and take place twice every winter under various conductors.

Every winter a series of Concerts is given by the Opera Orchestra, and Herr Weingartner, who may be looked upon as a conductor of the first rank, has raised the standard of these performances to a very high level; choral works are often given, amongst them every year the Choral Symphony, which receives, as a rule, a very fine interpretation, at any rate from the orchestra.

REVIEWS.

The Day School Hymn-Book. With Tunes. Edited by Emma Mundella. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Wherever we see Miss Mundella's name we expect good, sound, earnest work, and in the book before us we find it. Her wide experience, both as teacher and musician, eminently qualified her for the task of editing a work suitable to all grades of schools, both of boys and girls—a task, by the way, by no means of the easiest, either from a musical or literary point of view. The hymns are in various styles, and in nearly every case suitable to children. Of course there are the old favourites of Keble, Lyte, Bishop Ken, Mrs. Alexander, Watts, Wesley, and Ellerton, the more modern school being represented by Palgrave, Whittier, and others. A novel feature in the book is the introduction of French and German hymns, some of them, especially the old French, very beautiful. These must prove most useful in many of our larger and more advanced schools for girls, where the study of modern languages plays so important a part. The Latin hymns are better known; but we doubt if the old "Veni, Sancte Spiritus," has ever had a more felicitous setting than Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Lacrymæ." In fact the tunes are, almost without exception, well chosen, both for their intrinsic value and their adaptability to their respective words. We have the old-fashioned favourites of Boyce, Webbe, Lawes, &c.; the fine old German Chorales, without which no tune-book can be complete; and the modern style of tune which appeals to most of us so strongly, in some cases so tenderly—tunes by Parry, Sullivan, Stainer, Barnby, Dykes, Hopkins, and Smart. These are so exquisitely suitable, so artistically wedded to their words, that in most instances no improvement seems possible. One can so vividly imagine the elder classes singing Dr. Parry's beautiful setting to Hymn 6, and the evident delight with which the little ones pick up Sir John Stainer's "Little Pilgrim's Song" (No. 42). Then there is the more masculine element in Sir Joseph Barnby's "Bideford" (No. 62), and Dr. Bridge's most appropriate setting of Miss Mattheson's "How shall we worship Thee, O Lord." The harmony of the older tunes is distinctly in good taste; it is not so trite and old-fashioned as to weary the young singers, or so modernised as to be inconsistent with the old melodies. The arrangements from great masters have been most carefully chosen—it would be difficult to find objection to Schubert's lovely melody being wedded to such appropriate words as Hymn 76, or Schumann's to Hymn 89. The book is, in fact, one of the very best we have seen for schools of all classes; and one cannot help feeling the deepest regret that she, who has accomplished her task so thoroughly, so nobly, should not have lived to witness its well-merited success.

Novello's Part-Song Book. Nos. 738-750. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The excellence of this series is fully maintained by recent additions. Robert Burns's delightful little poem "A red, red rose" is charmingly set as a four-part song by J. Varley Roberts, in No. 738; and a no less attractive setting by the same composer of Sir John Suckling's well-known lines, "I prithee send me back my heart," will be found in No. 739. No. 740 is a melodious evening hymn by Jacques Blumenthal, admirably adapted for use in the home where there is musical ability. The same composer provides the three following numbers, the first of which is a vivacious setting of Herrick's "Gather ye rosebuds," and the second a part-song for five voices of considerable individuality, entitled "The loyal lover," the words of which have been taken from a manuscript of the time of Henry VIII. The third, called "The Butterfly," words by Thomas H. Bailey, is an extremely bright and attractive ditty. No. 744, dedicated to and composed expressly for the Guildhall School of Music by Orlando Morgan, and entitled "Good Night," is a pleasing example of its class. Of No. 745 it is sufficient to say that it is the song of "Victory," from Henry Purcell's "King Arthur." Conductors may be cautioned against taking this spirited music too fast, as otherwise the choristers will get into difficulties in which they have to repeat several times the words "They fly." The experience of Eaton Faning in choral training always enables him to write effectively for voices, and his skill is well shown in the "Song of the silent land" (No. 746), which is provided with ad libitum accompaniment for violin, violoncello, harp, and organ. The attention of antiquarian musicians will doubtless be attracted to No. 747, "Upon my lap my sovraigne sits," by Martin Peerson, 1620. This has been taken from "Private Musicke; or, the First Booke of Ayres and Dialogues, containing Songs of several sorts, and being Verse and Chorus is fit for Voyces and Viols." It has been carefully edited by Lionel Benson, and is an interesting specimen of the music of the seventeenth century. The spirit of P. B. Shelley's poem "Widow Bird" has been cleverly caught by Charles Wood in No. 748. No. 749 is a melodious four-part song by G. Bailey Vicars, entitled "Evening breezes." No. 750, by C. Hubert H. Parry, acquires peculiar distinction from being the tribute of this musician to the memory of the late Lord Leighton and Sir Joseph Barnby. It consists of a setting of the 123rd stanza from Tennyson's poem "In Memoriam," and is written for four voices. It is a very fine specimen of modern choral writing, and its conclusion is simply exquisite in its pathetic tenderness.

L'Orgue de Jean Sébastian Bach. Par A. Pirro. [Paris: Librairie Fischbacher.]

This is a volume of considerable interest. It deals not only with the great Cantor, but also with his predecessors, with the men whose precious merit it was "to prepare the way for Bach." Such a statement, as our author well reminds us, neither lessens their merit nor that of Bach. It is only by studying the predecessors of men of genius that one can really appreciate their wonderful achievements; the lower peaks of the Alps help the eye to measure the highest points. And the greater the immediate predecessor of genius, the greater does that genius appear. Buxtehude and Mozart enhance the glory of Bach and Beethoven. In speaking of Frescobaldi, M. Pirro reminds us of an interesting fact: Bach copied the whole of that composer's "Fiori musicali"; the precious copy (104 pages) is now preserved in the Royal Institute of Sacred Music at Berlin. In the notice of J. J. Froberger, our author treats as a ridiculous fable the story of that composer thankfully accepting the post of organ-blower at Westminster Abbey. Fact is sometimes stranger than fiction; anyhow the story came from foreign, not from English source. M. Pirro does not pretend to have discovered Bach. Dr. Spitta has written at length concerning the composer and his music; but the subject is practically inexhaustible, and our author has found, and men of generations to come may still find something new to say about him. The account given in this volume of the master's early fugues, in which weakness, the result of inexperience, can be traced, may prove of some consolation to young composers who gaze with despair at the fruits of his riper years; Bach did not come into the world a full-fledged genius. We have referred to Bach copying a work of Frescobaldi's. Our author farther on in his book shows by some interesting examples the result of that close study. And M. Pirro is evidently a well-read musician. In connection with the chromatic element which formed a special feature of Frescobaldi's music, he refers to various composers who had been influenced by the old Italian master. We find, by the way, a quotation from one of Kuhnau's Biblical Sonatas, works of great interest, yet little known. Dr. Spitta refers to them in his "Life of Bach," and his quotations and descriptions certainly create a desire to know more about them. As a Frenchman, M. Pirro naturally refers to the attention paid by Bach to French composers. The master, in his youthful days, actually copied a Suite by Grigny, organist at Rheims, and another one by Dieupart. He was also acquainted with the works of Marchand, Nivers, d'Anglebert, and Fr. Couperin. With regard to these latter M. Pirro, however, remarks: "Je doute que, par leur valeur intrinsèque, ces compositions, malgré le tour amusant de quelques-unes (par exemple, les pièces descriptives de Couperin), aient pu retenir longtemps son attention; Bach ne pouvait rien apprendre de leur technique, parfois enfantine: il sut tirer parti de leur qualités accessoires."* The section entitled "La Registration et les Ornements" is full of valuable imformation. With regard to ornaments we are reminded that Bach, in copies of his own works, made variations in the ornaments. Hence, although he has left explanations of his manières, M. Pirro wisely observes that "il ne faudrait affecter une rigueur excessive à ce sujet." This book has a preface from the pen of the distinguished organist and composer, M. Charles M. Widor, which is instructive and, at the same time, entertaining. Let us give one example of the latter quality. He is speaking of variety of tone in playing the organ, and adds: "Est-il rien de plus insupportable qu'une improvisation à quatre parties cheminant monochrome, cahin-caha, sans volonté, sans repos, sans contraste, sans architecture, sans commencement, sans milieu et sans fin? un macaroni au fromage!"†

* "I doubt whether their intrinsic value was sufficient to attract Bach's attention for long; and, notwithstanding that the tricks in some (as, for instance, the descriptive pieces of Couperin) are amusing, Bach could learn nothing from their technique, often childish; he knew how to take advantage of their accessory qualities."

† Is there anything more detestable than a four-part improvisation moving along in monochrome, dreary fashion, sans character, sans rest, sans contrast, sans architecture, sans beginning, sans middle, and sans end? a macaroni au fromage!

English Minstrelsie. A National Monument of English Song. Collated and edited, with Notes and Historical Introductions, by S. Baring Gould. The airs arranged by H. F. Sheppard, F. W. Bussell, and W. P. Hopkinson. [Edinburgh: T. C. and E. C. Jack.]

Having completed their series of volumes dealing with Scottish and Welsh "Minstrelsie," these enterprising publishers have turned their attention to the predominant partner of the great British firm, and commenced the issue of a companion work to the two just named, which, when complete, will consist of eight volumes and contain over 300 songs. The collection will differ to a certain extent from others, in that, while containing well-known and favourite songs, such as "Cherry Ripe," "The Wolf," and so on, it will also comprise many folk-songs that have been taken down from the mouths of the peasantry. As the authors of this work have already been associated in the production of two previous collections of English folk-song (both of them have been reviewed in these columns) every music-lover must by this time be aware that these gentlemen have been the means of preserving quite a large number of characteristic examples of native lyrical skill, which but for their efforts would have been lost to us for ever. The store of ditties they were able to accumulate was, however, far from being exhausted by the publication of "Songs of the West" or the subsequent "Garland," so that subscribers to "English Minstrelsie" may reasonably hope to come into possession of treasures that have not yet been submitted to the ordeal of print or public approval. As far as a perusal of the earlier volumes justifies judgment, it is possible to sympathize to a certain extent with the attitude of critics who have already pointed out that in "English Minstrelsie" neither of the classes appealed to find their wants entirely satisfied. But the authors have obviously tried to satisfy Peter without offending Paul; in other words, they have catered for the conscientious collector without forgetting the claims of the mere amateur. Such a task being as difficult as it is praiseworthy, its success must be measured from both standpoints. And so judged, we are of opinion that the authors of "English Minstrelsie" are entitled to a verdict of acquittal.

Suite from the Music to Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet." By Edward German. Pianoforte arrangement for four hands by the Composer. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This arrangement of the orchestral score for concert use of the expressive and charming music written for Mr. Forbes Robertson's production in September last of Shakespeare's immortal love-story, will doubtless be welcomed by a large number of pianists, and specially by those who witnessed the performance of the play at the Lyceum. The Suite—which, by the way, was played for the first time at one of Mr. Newman's Sunday Afternoon Orchestral Concerts at the Queen's Hall on March 29—consists of the Prelude, Pastorale, Pavane, Nocturne, and Dramatic Interlude. The Prelude opens with what may be termed the "Death" theme, which is soon followed by the "Love" motive. After some development, a quick and vigorous section is suggestive of the fight in Act 1 and the ill-feeling which exists between the Capulets and Montagues. Subsequently the love theme returns, and the movement ends with the ominous repetition of the "Death" motive. The Pastorale was written to precede Act 2, and at once captivates by the grace and melodiousness of its opening subject. The scene of the dance at Capulet's reception was one of the most attractive portions of Mr. Robertson's production, and the audience was seldom content until the piquant Pavane had been repeated, and to not a few music-lovers it will doubtless be the favourite number of the Suite. The Nocturne is, of course, concerned with the stolen interview between Romeo and his young bride. The music is essentially refined, but at the same time appropriately impassioned; a most effective climax being attained towards the close of the number. In the Dramatic Interlude the composer has ascended to higher ground, and the character of the movement is genuinely tragic. The "Death" and "Love" themes play important parts, and a dirge-like march theme adds impressiveness. It is not always that composers, when condensing their scores for use in the home, take into consideration the genius of the pianoforte or the abilities of average pianists; but in this instance the capacities of each have been duly observed, and the pianoforte arrangement, while cleverly preserving many characteristics of the orchestral score, secures the maximum effect with the minimum of difficulty.

The Philosophy of Voice. By Charles Lunn. [Baillière, Tindall and Cox.]

A BOOK which has attained its eighth edition may be said to have passed beyond the pale of criticism. The present edition, however, has been enlarged and contains many quotations of value, and every work that calls attention to the necessity of mental culture is to be welcomed. Mr. Lunn seems to have little faith in the abilities of modern singing masters, and says that "two thousand nine hundred and thirty-six years ago they knew better." Mr. Lunn's experience is larger than ours; but, judging from results to-day, we believe that the knowledge and ability to train voices are at least as great now as they were in the somewhat remote year referred to. Neither do we believe that the old Italian method of voice production is a "lost art." As a matter of fact, the fashion of formal florid flights has passed away and so the capability to perform them is no longer cultivated to the extent it was in the days when Rossini wrote, and, as executive facility was one of the most distinguishing features of the old Italian school, the cry has gone forth, accentuated by the headshakings of our grandparents, that singing is a "lost art." When, however, the reputation of vocalists shall depend upon the number of notes produced per second we may rely upon the "lost art," so called, being found. But we do not yearn for that time.

Novello's Octavo Anthems. Nos. 511-519. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

No better proof of the high standard of efficiency attained by our church choirs can be adduced than the high-class nature of the music of this series, which, to judge by its rapid extension, meets an increasing demand. In No. 511 will be found a sympathetic setting by Hamilton Clarke of Psalm 137, which contains a well-written portion for solo quartet or semi-chorus. The 5th, 6th, and 9th verses are omitted, the personal element being thus eliminated and the anthem being pathetically concluded with the last words of the 8th verse.

No. 512, "My Beloved spake," is a very interesting example of the genius of Henry Purcell. It is from an autograph score in the British Museum, and has been carefully edited by John E. West, who has described in footnotes the apparent mistakes in the original MS. which he has corrected in the present edition. The text consists of five verses from Chapter II. of "The Song of Solomon," and the work, which consists of eighteen pages, begins with a symphony of twenty-nine bars, the first of which differ from other published editions. The opening vocal parts are written for a counter-tenor, tenor, and first and second basses. At page 8 these give place to the usual four-part chorus, which is, however, on the next page succeeded by a "verse" section for alto, tenor, and first and second basses. Subsequently there is a tenor solo, the sopranos not being again called upon until the Finale is reached. Several instrumental interludes divide the sections and admirably prepare the way for the various changes of sentiment of the text. The spirit of this is reflected with remarkable fidelity in the music, which is dignified, vigorous, and impressive.

"Praise the Lord, O my Soul" (No. 513), is a verse anthem for six voices and chorus, and is not only one of the finest compositions in this form left us by Henry Purcell, but for lofty design and massive grandeur is unsurpassed in church music. This edition has been edited by Professor J. F. Bridge, who conducted its performance at the Purcell Centenary celebration in Westminster Abbey on November 21 last. "Thy Word is a Lantern" (No. 514) is another fine anthem by our great national composer, and has also been edited by Professor J. F. Bridge. It is, however, of less ambitious design than the preceding example, being only written for three voices, counter-tenor, tenor, and bass, and the usual four-part chorus. Purcell's intuitive appreciation of dramatic effect is noticeable in the setting of the words "Quicken me, O Lord." No. 515, "Through Peace to Light," by J. H. Roberts, is a setting of a sacred poem by Adelaide A. Proctor, with Welsh words by the Rev. W. Williams. The composer has caught the spirit of resignation which permeates the text and the music, which is written for four parts with an independent organ accompaniment, and makes no special demand on the vocalists, save at the close where the ascent, pianissimo, to the G above the treble stave is required to give the concluding cadence its due effect.

No. 517 is an anthem for Harvest Festivals by Professor Bridge. It would be highly effective even with a small choir; it is broad in style, fairly easy, and the verse parts are confined to tenor and bass. The middle movement is particularly flowing and beautiful.

Nos. 516, 518, and 519 are by Edgar Pettman, and respectively consist of an easy and tuneful Christmas anthem, "There were Shepherds"; "The Miserere," set to two chants suitable for congregational use; and an anthem for harvest festivals of a bright and genial character, entitled "I will open rivers in high places." The last-named has a solo for a bass voice and an effective four-part chorus.

Solemn March. By George Miller. Arranged for Pianoforte Solo and Duet from the Military Band Score by the Composer. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS march, composed by permission of Princess Beatrice as a tribute to the memory of the late Prince Henry of Battenberg, at whose funeral it was played, is an earnest and musicianlike composition of considerable interest. Effective use is made of a ground bass in association with the first subject, and the impressive nature of the music is well sustained throughout.

FOREIGN NOTES.

ATHENS.—During the recent gathering in connection with the Olympic Sports, the hymn composed for the occasion by Spiro Samara was performed at the Stadion by 400 singers with good effect.

BARCELONA.—A series of Concert performances, including portions of Wagner's "Nibelungen Tetralogy," has just been given here, under the direction of Señor Nicolau, with a success scarcely to be looked for amongst a Spanish audience.——A new operetta, "El Señor Corregidor," by the popular composer, Alfredo Chapi, bids fair to have a long run at the Eldorado.

BERLIN.—Operatic performances are to be given at the Krollsche Theater by the personnel of the Royal Opera during the period from the 15th inst. to September 15. It is announced that the theatre in question has been purchased by the crown for the sum of two and a half millions of marks.——Herr Heinrich Barth, the excellent pianist, well known in England, celebrated, on the 1st ult., the twenty-fifth anniversary of his professorship at the Berlin Hochschule.——The bi-centenary of the existence of the Berlin Royal Academy of Arts is to be celebrated this month by a Musical Festival, under the direction of Dr. Joachim, comprising, on the 5th inst., a grand Concert in the Sing-Akademie; on the 7th inst., a performance of Herr Max Bruch's oratorio "Moses," and on the following day a final Concert at the Sing-Akademie.

BRUSSELS.—At the Theatre de la Monnaie, the season of which closes early in the present month, performances were given last month to full houses of "La Vivandière," as well as of "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin," with M. van Dyck in the titular parts of the two latter. The excellent Concerts of orchestral and chamber music instituted by M. Ysaÿe have likewise met with a fair share of success during their present first season. At an extra Concert, given by M. Ysaÿe on the 2nd ult., M. Adolphe Samuel's remarkable oratorio "Christus" was produced for the first time in the Belgian capital, when it met with an enthusiastic reception, the performance proving, indeed, one of the principal events of the season.

BUDAPESTH.—An opera, "A Falu Rossza" ("The village vagabond"), by Jenö Hubay, was produced for the first time last month at the National Theatre. The new work is essentially Hungarian in character, and pleased greatly, especially in its lyrical portions.

Carlsruhe.—Smetana's comic opera "The Bartered Bride" was brought out at the Court Theatre last month for the first time, under Herr Mottl's direction, and received with high favour, Frau Mottl sustaining the principal lady's part.

Cassel.—Zeller's operetta "Der Obersteiger" was produced for the first time at the Hof-Theater, on March 26, and received with much favour.

Cologne.—Herr Engelbert Humperdinck's latest composition—viz., some incidental music to a drama, entitled "Der Richter von Zalamea," has recently been performed here for the first time and greatly applauded.

Copenhagen.—One of the most important events of the season here was the series of Concerts announced to be given, from the 24th to the 28th ult., by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction respectively of Dr. Muck (of Berlin), Dr. Hans Richter, M. Ed. Colonne (of Paris), Edvard Grieg, and Professor Mannstaedt.

Eger.—The distinguished musical amateur, Rudolph Freiherr von Procházka, gave an interesting performance here recently of portions of a music-drama from his pen, entitled "Clytemnestra," the libretto of which is an adaptation by him of the "Agamemnon of Æschylus."

Florence.—The first representation in Italy took place, on March 26, at the Pergola Theatre here, of Mr. De Lara's opera, "Amy Robsart," the composer himself being present. The work met with an enthusiastic reception on the part of a distinguished audience, the composer being called before the curtain some twenty times during the three acts.—— Camillo Baucja is the name of the "artist" who last month accomplished the feat of actively "presiding" at the pianoforte for forty-six consecutive hours with selections from "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Faust," "Carmen," and other operas. The performance is claimed to have been a "record" one. May it long remain so!

Frankfort-on-Main.—A one-act comic opera, entitled "Trischka," was brought out at the Stadt-Theater last month with much success. The composer is Herr Meyer-Helmund, and the libretto deals with an adventure assigned by tradition to the famous dancer Maria Taglioni, who, falling into the hands of the daring but chivalrous bandit chief Trischka, regained her liberty and valuables by an impromptu demonstration of her inimitable art.——In the sale by auction, held here last month, of autographs formerly in the possession of the Brentano family, twelve letters by Beethoven were acquired for the Beethoven Haus, in Bonn, realising the sum of 3,990 marks.

Hamburg.—A great-grandson of Sebastian Bach, and grandson of Philipp Emanuel Bach, introduced himself to a select audience last month at the Tonkünstler-Verein, in the capacity of composer and pianist. Herr Hermann Bach, who has hitherto resided in Frankfort, and who appears to be an able pianist and improvisateur, intends, it is said, to establish himself in Hamburg as a musician.

Heidelberg.—A curious and interesting instance of the international character which the Wagner-cult has assumed is furnished in the series of Lectures on the "Nibelungen Tetralogy," recently given here by the well-known Portuguese pianist, José Vianna da Motta. The lectures, accompanied by an illustration on the pianoforte, were intended as an introduction to the forthcoming Bayreuth performances, and met with much appreciation.

Liegnitz.—The musical Festival originally planned for the first week in last month will actually take place from the 4th to the 7th inst., a notable feature in the programme being the performance twice over, on two consecutive days, of Tinel's oratorio "Franciscus." Frau Strauss-Kurzwelly, Herr Kronberger, and Professor Kühn will be the principal solo vocalists.

Lisbon.—A project, supported in influential quarters, has been set on foot here for the establishment of a national Portuguese Opera. According to our contemporary Amphion, the project has a good chance of being realised. Native executive artists have undoubtedly come to the fore of recent years, and as for the composers, an establishment such as contemplated may bring them forward likewise.—— Señor Sarasate gave a series of Concerts recently at the San Carlos Theatre to enormous audiences.

Madrid.—Herr Kogel, the Frankfort capellmeister, who has just conducted two Symphony Concerts here with immense success, has accepted an engagement to conduct a series of performances with the Madrid Orchestra in the principal towns of Spain and Portugal during the present month.

Mannheim.—The first performance, at the Court Theatre, of Herr Felix Weingartner's opera "Genesius" was announced to take place on the 19th ult. The composer has been superintending the final rehearsals.

Mayence.—A comic opera, "Die Fürstin von Athen," by the late Friedrich Lux, the whilom excellent Mayence capellmeister and organist, was produced here for the first time last month, under Herr Steinbach's direction, and very favourably received.

Monte Carlo.—The late César Franck's posthumous opera, "Ghiselle," the instrumentation of which had been completed by several of his pupils, was successfully performed here, on the 6th ult., to a distinguished audience, including the Prince of Wales.

Milan.—A brilliant success was achieved by the first performance, on the 1st ult., at La Scala, of a new opera, "André Chénier," by the young Maëstro Umberto Giordano, the composer of "Mala Vita." The libretto, from the pen of Signor Illica, deals with a tragic episode during the period of the great French Revolution, the work being divided into four acts, the first and last of which proved the most successful. Genuine enthusiasm, however, prevailed throughout the performance, the composer being recalled many times, as were also the principal vocalists, Signora Carrera, the tenor Borgatti, and the baritone Sanmarco.

Munich.—Herr Alfred Reisenauer made his first appearance here last month, and, as everywhere, gained the highest appreciation. The distinguished pianist proceeded from here to Russia, where he is to give a series of Concerts previous to his visit to London in June.——In view of the enormous attraction exercised by last year's similar undertaking, the directors of the Royal Opera have just published a fresh scheme of special performances of opera, to take place during the months of August and September next, including works by Mozart, Beethoven, and Wagner. The Wagner performances are to take place at the Royal Theatre, and will comprise "Rienzi," "Der fliegende Holländer," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan und Isolde," and "Die Meistersinger." At the same theatre will be given "Fidelio," preceded by the festal play "Die Ruinen von Athen," with Beethoven's music. The Mozart representations will take place at the Royal Residenz Theater, when last year's admirable performances of "Le Nozze di Figaro" will be repeated, while "Don Giovanni," entirely in accordance with the actual score used by the master at the original (Prague) performance, and with his own scenic directions, will also be given. The latter should prove a particularly welcome addition to the scheme to many amateurs.——Court-Capellmeister Röhr, of Mannheim, has accepted a conductorship at the Royal Opera, in conjunction with Herren Richard Strauss and Franz Fischer; Capellmeister Levi having obtained leave of absence for an indefinite time on account of ill-health. Herr Richard Strauss has nearly completed a new orchestral composition to which he has given the distinctly unconventional title of "Thus spake Zarathustra."

New York.—A diamond tiara, valued at upwards of a £1,000, was presented to Madame Nordica, on the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House, between the first and second acts of "Lohengrin," on the 16th ult. It had been subscribed for by about five hundred music-lovers of New York, each subscription being limited to two pounds, in recognition of the celebrity and popularity which this American-born prima donna enjoys.

Prague.—On the 15th ult. Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon" was revived at the National Opera House. Miss Otilie Dvorákova interpreted the title rôle with great success, her fresh, full, well-trained voice and sympathetic and natural acting gaining the complete approval of the audience as well as of the press.

Regensburg.—Two complete performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, separated only by one hour's interval, were given, on March 27, by the combined forces of the Regensburg Musikverein and the Lieder Kranz, in conjunction with the Munich Kaim-Orchestra, under the direction of Herr Zumpe. The experiment, first made some years since by the late Hans von Bülow, proved a complete success.

Rome.—A season of opera is about to commence at the Costanzi Theatre, for which, amongst other artists, Signora Bellincioni and Signor Stagno have been engaged. The performances will include that of a new opera by a young composer, Signor Setaccioli, entitled "La sorella di Marx," the libretto of which is the joint work of Signora Bellincioni and Signor Golisciani.——The success of Signor Leoncavallo's "Chatterton" has been amply confirmed by the ten performances which have taken place of the work at the National Theatre here, the house being crowded on each occasion by an enthusiastic audience.——An official decree has just been published, prolonging the rights of authorship in Rossini's "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," about to expire, for another two years, in order, it is said, to secure the revenues derived from it to the Liceo Rossini in Pesaro, an Institution which, however, is amply provided for, the master having bequeathed to it a capital of nearly three millions of francs.

St. Petersburg.—The Emperor has accepted the dedication of a posthumous opera, entitled "Kyril von Thessalonich," by the Cologne pianist, Eduard Mertke, and the work will most likely be shortly produced at the Imperial Opera.——Mdlle. Clotilde Kleeberg has given several Concerts here and in Moscow recently with brilliant success. She also had the honour of playing before the Czarina, by whom she was presented with a most valuable bracelet.

Singapore.—The octogenarian pianist, Chevalier Antoine de Kontski, to whose present extensive concert-tour in the far East we alluded some time since, gave a Concert here recently which, according to the Singapore Free Press, proved an enormous attraction. The veteran artist was to have continued his tour through India, and thence, by way of Siberia, to Russia, before returning to his adopted home in the United States.

Stettin.—A monument is to be erected to Carl Loewe, the famous composer of Balladen, in front of the Jakobi-Kirche, of which he was for many years the esteemed cantor, the unveiling ceremony being timed for November 30, the birth centenary of the composer. Another monument to Loewe, modelled by Professor Schaper, is shortly to be inaugurated at Kiel, where he died in 1869.

Stockholm.—The first performance took place at the Royal Theatre, on March 16, of a new opera by Herr Andreas Hallén, entitled "Hexfällen" ("The Witches' Trap"), the libretto by Herr Franz Hedberg, with considerable success.

Turin.—The season of opera at the Teatro Regio came to a close on March 22. In the course of its three months' duration, "Götterdämmerung" was given twenty-one times, Puccini's "La Bohème" twenty-three, and Verdi's "Falstaff" five times.

Vienna.—The long deferred ceremony of unveiling the monument erected to Mozart in this capital was announced definitely to take place on the 21st ult. It is wrought in Styrian marble, with a granite base, the statue of the composer being nine feet high, and a large relievo, representing two scenes from "Don Giovanni," adorning the front portion of the pedestal. The monument, which stands on the Albrechtsplatz, in the rear of the Opera (the square in front of the building having proved too small), was to be unveiled by the Emperor himself, while operatic representations and concert performances in connection with the event, extending over several days, were announced. The ceremony derives a melancholy interest from the premature death of the sculptor, Herr Tilgner, to which we refer in our obituary column.——Johannes Brahms has been elected a member of the Paris Academy of Fine Arts ——An excellent performance was given, on the 1st ult., by the Philharmonic Society, of Friedrich Kiel's masterly but seldom-heard oratorio "Christus."——A new operetta, "Der Wunder Knabe," by Herr Eugen von Taund, is having a successful run at the Theatre an der Wien.——The Concert conducted on March 24 by Edvard Grieg, for the benefit of the pensioners of the Conservatorium, was, undoubtedly, one of the most interesting events of the season. The programme contained only works by the Norwegian master—viz., three orchestral numbers from "Sigurd Jorsalfar," the first "Peer Gynt" Suite, elegiac melodies for strings, the Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, and a number of Lieder. The latter were finely interpreted by Frau Ellen Gulbranson, of Stockholm, and Fräulein Dagmar Walle-Hansen was the pianist. Grieg was the object of a perfect ovation on the part of the crowded audience.——Herr Johannes Messchaërt, the excellent baritone, gave a series of Song-recitals here recently which attracted enthusiastic audiences. He was admirably supported by Herr Julius Röntgen, of Amsterdam, an excellent pianist and accompanist.

Weimar.—A one-act opera, "Der Müller von Sans-Souci," by a young Dresden musician, Herr Otto Urbach, is shortly to be brought out at the Court Theatre here, as well as at Leipzig and Frankfort. Herr Humperdinck and other well known critics speak most highly of the score of the work, which, it is said, would have been first brought out by the Berlin Opera but for the circumstance of a personage of the Royal House—viz., Frederick the Great—forming part of the cast.——The first performance of Herr Hans Sommer's opera "Der Meermann" was expected to take place on the 19th ult.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On the 13th ult. Messrs. Harrison gave an extra Concert in the Town Hall, with the assistance of Madame Adelina Patti and Lady Hallé, neither of whom, as I have stated in a previous letter, was able to appear during the season on the dates originally announced. Madame Patti was in excellent voice and received the usual ovation. Lady Hallé gave with indescribable charm and depth of feeling the slow movement from Spohr's Ninth Concerto. She gained most applause, however, for her performance of Bazzini's tricky and fascinating "Danse des Lutins," and for once broke through her rule and responded with Wieniawski's Mazurka. The artistic personnel also included Miss Ada Crossley, the Australian contralto, Mr. Robert Eadie (tenor), Mr. John Morley (basso), the Columbians (a vocal quartet composed of four ladies), Herr Franz Liebich (pianist), and Mr. F. T. Watkis (accompanist).

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society produced for the first time here, on March 26, Edgar Tinel's dramatic oratorio "St. Francis," the principal parts being taken by Madame Amy Sherwin, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Andrew Black, and Mr. J. Sandbrook. The work had been admirably prepared by Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap and was conducted by him with great tact and judgment, but more rehearsals would have been acceptable. Whether "St. Francis" will appeal to the religious sense of English music-lovers is an open question. The audience showed but little sympathy with the work. Anything like enthusiasm was only shown on the conclusion of Mr. Edward Lloyd's magnificent singing of the Hymns of the "Sun" and of "Love"—certainly the most lyrical numbers in the lengthy and sombre work. The choral recitatives were, on the whole, impressively given; but for special distinction I have to point out the rendering of the angelic chorus "Love, 'tis love that mildly rules," for female voices, with which the second part closes. Probably the most characteristic and most pronounced effects are produced by the composer's somewhat original treatment in depicting joy, sorrow, and death, and herein we have the key-note of the intrinsic value of his work. Local audiences are certainly indebted to Dr. Heap for having introduced a work that has been so much talked about, but I doubt whether it will ever be heard again in this city.

One of the most enjoyable Concerts of the season was that given by our English pianist, Miss Fanny Davies. Dr. Joachim and Signor Piatti were again associated with her, special interest being manifested in the re-appearance of the veteran violoncellist. The programme was well worthy of the occasion and comprised Brahms's Trio in B major (Op. 8), Schumann's "Davidsbündler" (Op. 6), Max Bruch's Violin Concerto (No. 1) in G minor, Haydn's Sonata in C major (arranged for the violoncello by Signor Piatti), some excerpts from Chopin's pianoforte works, &c. I need only add that the efforts of these great artists were received by the large audience with genuine enthusiasm.

The Midland Musical Society, under Mr. Stevenson's conductorship, gave its annual performance of Gounod's "Redemption," on Good Friday evening, before an enormous audience. The chorus sang remarkably well and the beautiful orchestral accompaniments were given with acceptable light and shade.

Mr. J. W. Turner's Opera Company has commenced a four weeks' operatic season at the Grand Theatre, and has already produced the most popular works in its repertory. The largest houses were secured with the ever-popular "Maritana" (with Mr. Turner as Don César) and with "Fra Diavolo." Mr. Turner has with him a superb chorus and an admirable artistic personnel.

Mr. John Dunn, the famous violinist of the North, met with an extraordinary reception at Messrs. Facer and Oscar Pollack's first Popular Concert. The clever virtuoso has quite established himself as a favourite with our local public, and, in my opinion, never played with more exquisite feeling or with greater brilliancy than he did on this occasion.

The Madrigal Choir in connection with the Midland Institute gave a fine selection of madrigals and part-songs, in the large Lecture Theatre of the Institute, under Mr. George Halford's conductorship. For delicacy and exquisite pianissimo I have to single out Barnby's "Sweet and low," which I have never heard given with better effect.

Byron's "Manfred," with Schumann's Incidental Music, was produced for the first time here, in the Town Hall, by the Birmingham Amateur Orchestral Society and the Madrigal Choir in connection with the Midland Institute, under Mr. George Halford's conductorship. The recitation of the poem (abridged for concert purpose) was entrusted to Mr. Charles Fry, the well known reciter and elocutionist, who achieved a complete success by his intelligent and truly dramatic delivery of the chief episodes in the drama. The programme also included Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, in B flat, the Overture and selections from "The Flying Dutchman," and Grieg's "Landerkennung."

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

There have been many Concerts and musical performances in Bristol during the past month, but few were of sufficient importance to be recorded. During Lent and Easter Gaul's "Passion Music," Williams's "Bethany," and Stainer's "Crucifixion" were given in several of the city and suburban churches, in some cases with orchestral accompaniment. Every year there is an addition to the number of places of worship where services of this character are held at particular periods.

A good deal of interest centred in the visit to Bristol of the Treorky Royal Male-Voice Choir, on March 24, on its return to the principality from London, and a large audience assembled to hear it. But in a city where part-singing is cultivated to a high and refined pitch, the Welshmen did not shine to the best advantage, and though their performances were creditable, the results, as a whole, were disappointing to Bristolians.

The Nonconformist Choirs' Association held its annual Festival on March 23, when sixteen choirs, comprising 400 vocalists, all from South Bristol, took part.

Among the miscellaneous Concerts were two given by the railway servants on Good Friday, a Ballad and Instrumental Concert at the Victoria Rooms on Easter Tuesday, one at Redland Park on the 15th ult., at which several part-songs were well sung, and the annual public appearance of the North Bristol Musical Society and St. George's Choral Society jointly, who, on the 15th ult., gave a praiseworthy interpretation of a portion of Haydn's "Seasons," under the direction of Mr. J. F. Nash.

Best of all was the fine performance, by the Bristol Choral Society, of the "Hymn of Praise" and Handel's "Hailstone" Chorus, on the 18th ult. Mendelssohn's composition is a favourite with Bristol singers, hence its rendering on the present occasion by a choir of 550 voices, under the inspiriting guidance of Mr. Riseley, was magnificent and very impressive. The principal vocalists were Miss Anna Williams and Mr. Edward Lloyd, who acquitted themselves with their customary artistic excellence.

Clevedon Choral Society gave a pleasing interpretation of Sterndale Bennett's bright and tuneful "May Queen," on the 8th ult., under the direction of Mr. Marchant. The soloists were Miss F. Bradbury, Miss G. Wickenden, Mr. Partridge, and Mr. A. Trowbridge.

On the 14th ult. the Midsomer Norton and District Choral Society gave a Concert, directed by Mr. W. J. Kidner. A number of familiar part-songs, glees, and songs constituted the programme, and they were all rendered with gratifying results.

At the concluding Concert of the season of the Weston-super-Mare Philharmonic Society, on the 15th ult., a capital performance of Haydn's "Creation" was given (with Miss M. Eaton, Mr. J. D. Trotter, and Mr. W. Thomas as soloists), under the direction of Mr. E. Cook.

MUSIC IN DUNDEE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Dundee Amateur Choral Union gave the second Concert of the season on March 31, with Mr. Carl D. Hamilton as conductor. The vocal part of the programme consisted of Gade's "Spring's Message" and Macfarren's "May Day," for chorus and orchestra, and some part-songs; several orchestral pieces were played by the Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society, who also accompanied the choral works.

On the 8th ult. a most enjoyable Pianoforte Recital was given by Mons. Siloti.

The Arbroath Philharmonic Society gave a successful Concert in Arbroath on the 15th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. R. O. Stoole. The programme included Beethoven's C minor Symphony and C minor Concerto, the Overtures to "Die Zauberflöte" and Cherubini's "Les Abencerrages, and Massenet's Prelude, "La Vièrge." Considering the difficulty of the works, the performances deserve much praise. The soloists were Miss Mary Reeve (vocalist), Miss Louie Heath (pianist), and Mr. A. Halstead (flautist).

A similar Concert was given in Dundee on the following evening by the Dundee Orchestral Society, which is conducted by Mr. A. M. Stoole, and in this case also the orchestra acquitted itself admirably. The chief pieces were Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and "Rosamunde" Overture, Svendsen's Romance, with the solo part played by all the first violins; Wagner's Introduction to the third act in "Lohengrin," and Handel's Concerto (No. 9) for organ and orchestra. The soloists were Miss Reeve, Mr. A. Halstead, and Mr. D. Stephen (organist).

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

At the request of the Committee of the Norwich Church of England Young Men's Society, Dr. Bunnett gave a Lecture on March 31, in their room, on "Oratorio: its rise and development." He prefaced the Lecture with the remark that in the short time at his disposal it would be impossible to take more than a cursory glance at so vast a subject; but in the hour and half which its delivery took the doctor managed to thoroughly interest his large audience, and opened to view a field which it is to be hoped some among his younger hearers may be inclined to cultivate for themselves. At various points of the Lecture musical illustrations were sung, and Dr. Bunnett had taken some pains that they should each be good specimens of their composer's work and those not generally known.

St. Andrew's Hall was filled to its utmost capacity on Good Friday, when the annual performance of "The Messiah," started by Drs. Bunnett and Hill several years since, was given. The soloists engaged were Miss Mabel Berrey, Miss May Seiber, Mr. Sawford Dye, and Mr. Leonard Russell. As usual, Dr. Bunnett did yeoman service at the organ, while Dr. Hill conducted with customary discretion.

A special Service was held in Norwich Cathedral on the evening of Thursday in Holy Week, when Haydn's Passion music was sung by the choir, the very reverend the Dean giving a short address between each number. A large congregation was present, and Haydn's lovely music was listened to with rapt attention. With Dr. Bates at the organ a very refined performance of the work was given.

A Student's Musical Evening was held at the Norwich School of Music to commemorate the close of the Spring Term, on the 16th ult., the juvenile performers showing considerable intelligence in the execution of the various pieces. The improvement displayed by the orchestral class was much commented upon.

Stainer's "Crucifixion" was sung in St. Michael Coslany Church on the Monday in Holy Week by the choir, the tenor and bass solos being given by Mr. H. J. Brookes and Mr. Brockbank, lay clerks at Norwich Cathedral, Mr. Leader presiding at the organ. A highly creditable performance resulted. The same work was also given at St. Martin-at-Palace Church on the following Wednesday evening, but there the choir was hardly equal to the work. Mr. Sawford Dye and Mr. Brockbank left nothing to be desired so far as the solos were concerned. Mr. Briggs was at the organ.

A special Service of Praise was held in Holy Trinity Church, Norwich, on Wednesday evening, the 15th ult., when Sir John Stainer's cantata "The Daughter of Jairus," was sung, under the direction of Mr. James W. Muirhead. The soloists were Miss Alice Watling, Rev. S. Boyton Smith, and Mr. F. Preston.

With the aid of several willing outside helpers, the choir of the Unthanks Road Baptist Church gave a performance of Gaul's "Holy City," on March 26, in aid of the church funds; the solos and concerted numbers were sung by local amateurs. A peculiar circumstance was the importation of the orchestral members of the Diss Choral Society, who were responsible for the accompaniments. A fairly creditable performance resulted, although want of united rehearsal was evident. Mr. W. L. Palmer conducted with painstaking care.

A meeting of the Eastern Section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians was held at the School of Music, Norwich, on the 8th ult., with Dr. Bunnett in the chair. Mr. H. C. Banister delivered an address, entitled "Some thoughts concerning musical compositions." His remarks were highly interesting and instructive, and the paper richly deserved the hearty vote of thanks accorded it.

The closing Popular Organ Recital of the season, on the 18th ult., was appropriately utilised as a fitting occasion to present the testimonial raised to commemorate the musical jubilee of Dr. Bunnett, under whose fostering care these Recitals have attained such signal success. St. Andrew's Hall was literally packed from end to end, many hundreds having been turned away. Part of the programme having been gone through, the Mayor (John Moore, Esq.) attended by the Sheriff, Deputy-Mayor, the Dean, and other gentlemen, ascended the platform, and after referring to the success which had attended the Recitals during the season, went on to speak of the services which Dr. Bunnett had for fifty years rendered the cause of music in the city, and what gratification it was to him (the Mayor) to be the mouthpiece of his fellow-citizens on this occasion. The presentation consisted of an illuminated address, handsomely framed, an album containing the names of the subscribers, and a cheque for £280. The recipient of these good things, in the course of his reply, referred to several unusual musical events in Norwich with which he had been connected, and at the close of his remarks, which were frequently interrupted by applause, heartily thanked those who had so kindly interested themselves in the matter, specially mentioning Mr. F. O. Taylor, the hon. secretary of the fund.

The initial Concert of the lately established Lowestoft Musical Union came off on the 14th ult., and if its quality may be taken as suggestive of future efforts very happy results may be expected from the establishment of this Society. The Choir is fairly evenly balanced and contains some good and powerful voices and, under the tutelage of Mr. H. D. Flowers, the parish organist, they have had a very careful training. Barnby's "Rebekah" was the work chosen for the début of the Society, a wise selection, because the chorus work is neither heavy nor very difficult, but it received an intelligent rendering. The small contingent of local instrumentalists was strengthened by friends from Norwich, so that the accompaniments were well cared for. The principal vocal parts were taken by Madame Blanche Powell, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, and Mr. S. Heath. The second part was of the usual miscellaneous character, six pieces out of ten being encored.

Bach's "Passion" music according to St. John was given at a special Service held in St. Margaret's Church, King's Lynn, on March 27. The choir consisted of about 100 voices, supported by an orchestra of twenty instrumentalists led by Mr. F. W. B. Noverre. The vocal solos were sung by the Rev. H. D. Barrett, Mr. A. H. Cross, and Mr. G. R. Oswell. Mr. J. H. Pratt presided at the organ, and Mr. H. B. Collins conducted a highly creditable performance.

The Wymondham Musical Society gave an Invitation Lenten Concert, on March 19, in the Public Hall, which was largely attended. A selection from Gaul's "Holy City" formed the first half of the programme, the solos being sung by Miss Postle, Mrs. Reyner, Mr. H. Brummage, and Mr. Reyner, a very capable amateur quartet. The choral numbers were given with highly satisfactory results. A small band of local performers assisted in the accompaniments, which are not very difficult. A selection of songs and concerted numbers of a more or less religious character brought a pleasant evening to a close. Mr. A. S. Wilde conducted and accompanied.

Conducted by Mr. H. W. Boughton, the Thetford Choral Union gave a Concert on the evening of March 19, a cantata entitled "The Voyage" being the principal piece. The solos were capitally sustained by members of the Union. The second half was devoted to a miscellaneous vocal selection.

Cowen's "St. John's Eve" formed the principal piece at a Concert given by the Felixstowe Choral Society on the 9th ult. The leading parts were taken by Miss Wilmot Briggs, Miss K. Taylor, Mr. Ernest Hodgson, and Mr. A. E. Turner with marked success. The band (chiefly Ipswich residents) and chorus numbered 100 performers, and, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Palmer, gave a good rendering of its share of the work.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

The end of the season brings the usual number of Concerts by Edinburgh choral societies. Mr. Millar Craig's Choir (instituted in 1873 as Mr. Waddell's Choir) holds a splendid record for uncompromising earnestness of work and a determination to study and produce before the Edinburgh public the masterpieces of the greatest choral composers. It is to the enterprise of this Society that Edinburgh owes its introduction to the "St. Matthew" Passion, Brahms's "Requiem," Cherubini's D minor Mass, the "Pilgrimage of the Rose," and many other important choral classics. The programme and performance at the annual Concert, on March 30, fully maintained the excellent reputation of the chorus. The principal work in the programme was the "Pilgrimage of the Rose," in which the important solo work was carefully interpreted by members of the choir. Brahms's powerful "Song of Destiny" was extremely well rendered by the chorus; but it is just in such works that the inadequate scale of accompaniment at these Concerts is most painfully felt. A pianoforte, even played as well as it was by Mr. Tom Craig and assisted by a harmonium, is neither strong enough for such a large chorus nor interesting enough for such an accompaniment. The "Song of Destiny," which stood first on the programme, was followed by Goetz's beautiful setting of "By the Waters of Babylon," which has not been heard in Edinburgh for many years.

On the 7th ult. Mr. Kirkhope's Choir gave a performance of Brahms's "Requiem." This splendid body of singers overcame the immense difficulties of the work with ease and conspicuous success. The fresh quality of the soprano voices and their large number enabled them to scale all the perilous heights to which the composer has called them—a task which evidently strained the resources of the tenors. The perfect unanimity and exquisite light and shade which so distinguish Mr. Kirkhope's singers were shown to great advantage in Dr. Parry's "Blest Pair of Sirens," and "Gallia" proved a very acceptable finale to the programme. Miss Fillunger undertook the soprano solos in the "Requiem" and "Gallia," and her earnestness and artistic feeling enabled her to do them every justice. The baritone soloist was not so successful. An excellent orchestra, mostly of local musicians, played the accompaniments with great care and excellent effect. None of the works were unfamiliar to chorus or audience, and it may be suggested that the "Death of Cuthullin" is hardly important enough to figure as the only novelty in the annual programme of an organisation favoured, as Mr. Kirkhope's Choir is, in so many ways.

M. Siloti gave a Pianoforte Recital in the Music Hall, on the 10th ult., and afforded the greatest possible pleasure to a large audience by his poetic reading of Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor, his dainty execution of a little piece entitled "Le coucou," by Daquin, and by the dash and fire he infused into a splendid interpretation of Liszt's Second Rhapsody.

At a Concert given in the Freemasons' Hall, on the 16th ult., the most important features were Mr. Lemonné's exquisite flute playing, and the Erard "Grand" with the new "Resonator."

On the 1st ult. Gounod's "Redemption" (Parts 1 and 2) was given at St. Paul's Church, York Place, by the choir, under the guidance of Mr. Prendergast, who supplied the organ accompaniment.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Naturally enough our smaller choral societies get a chance after the close of the musical season proper, and as many of those choirs accomplish oftener than not some excellent work, they lay fair claim to, at any rate, a brief record of their doings. Space, however, can only permit us to note one or two interesting performances which have taken place of late in and around Glasgow, and these included special attention to Mr. F. H. Cowen's cantata "The Rose Maiden," by the choir of Kent Road United Presbyterian Church Musical Association and by the choir attached to Kelvingrove Church. There was also an excellent performance of Sir John Stainer's beautiful work "The Crucifixion" by the Govan Parish Church Choir, and the same composition was likewise announced under the auspices of Maxwell Parish Church. At John Street Church the Service of Praise comprised Sterndale Bennett's "The Woman of Samaria," and a somewhat ambitious programme was undertaken by the choir of Wellington Church, when they submitted Spohr's "Last Judgment." The result was, however, very satisfactory; so much so that next season's arrangements should be anticipated with considerable interest.

On March 31 the Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society cut out for itself a more important programme than it has ever essayed, but as our leading amateur organisation scored in several instances a distinct success, Mr. W. T. Hoeck, the conductor, was amply justified in making his selections. The band includes sixty strings (of whom fourteen are lady executants), and in this department showed a marked advance as regards fulness of tone and general executive ability. The wood-wind are also uncommonly good. Ambroise Thomas's Overture to "Raymond" was, perhaps, the hit of the evening; Schubert's "Overture in the Italian style" and the orchestral work in Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia were also admirably performed. In the last-named Mr. Theodor Hoeck took the pianoforte part, and with considerable credit to himself as a rising young artist. Miss Lindsay Currie sang to the admiration of her many Glasgow friends, and the assistance of male members of the Glasgow Choral Union was valuable in the double chorus from Mendelssohn's "Œdipus at Colonos," as also in Grieg's "Landerkennung" (Op. 31).

Several composers held in great regard appeared in the programme of the annual Concert given by the Glasgow Glee and Catch Club on the evening of the 14th ult. Mendelssohn, Calcott, Kücken, and Festa, not to mention other equally attractive glee and part-song writers, seemed to emphasize once more the charms associated with their art. At any rate, their devotees should be accorded the right to an opinion, and the very large audience present at this agreeable function showed unmistakably the faith prevailing amongst many prominent local musicians. Much of the enthusiasm was elicited, of course, by the finished character of the performances. Not only are the individual voices of admirable quality, but the singing is invariably artistic—as it well may be under the experienced training of Mr. Allan W. Young, the popular conductor. Several solos were contributed during the evening with much acceptance, and Mr. Hirst's aid at the pianoforte proved invaluable.

Madame Adelina Patti was at St. Andrew's Hall on the 15th ult., when she was assisted by the young Australian contralto, Miss Ada Crossley, Mr. John Lemonné (the flautist), and one or two new-comers.

The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company opened its Spring season at the Theatre Royal on the 20th ult., with Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman," and, during the first week of the engagement, "Mignon," "The Meistersingers," "Tannhäuser," and "The Vivandiere" were announced.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The final Concert of the fifty-seventh season of the Philharmonic Society, on March 24, placed in especial evidence the immense strides made by the chorus since the new conductor took things in hand. Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah" is just such a work as would tax to the utmost the powers of choristers whose attention is most usually given to a more severe form of oratorio. Anyway a distinct triumph is to be recorded, and in this the laurels will be fairly divided between Mr. F. H. Cowen and his forces. The work itself proved an acceptable if at times a startling novelty to the fashionable audience which gathers at the regular Subscription Concerts held by the premier Society in the Philharmonic Hall.

The Orchestral Society, under Mr. Rodewald, the Wirral Amateurs, under Mr. Schiever, and the Società Armonica, under Mr. Cafferata, have concluded successful seasons. At the annual meeting of the latter, the President (Councillor Anthony Shelmerdine) said that the records of the Society, which was perhaps one of the oldest amateur orchestral organisations in the country, showed that it was formed in 1847. Amongst many other honoured Liverpool men the following had been members: Charles Santley, Edward Samuelson, J. B. Cooper, James Aiken, Palgrave Simpson, Henry Sudlow, Thomas Littledale, Joseph, John, and Samuel Mottram, H. S. Alpass, Hugh Perkins, David Longbottom, A. G. Kurtz, and Charles Cafferata. There were some curiosities visible in the old accounts. He noticed on August 14, 1849, "Hire of a double bass, 12s., and repairs to it afterwards, 15s."; also accounts for pies, porter, and sandwiches, and an account for joiner's work—that of repairing a double bass.

The Musical Society promises Sullivan's "Golden Legend" and other popular works for next year. The choristers of the city at large took part in goodly numbers in the annual performance of Handel's "Messiah," given every Good Friday free to the poor, Mr. J. C. Clarke being conductor. The Post Office Choral Society, on the same day and in the same place, in the evening gave Haydn's "Creation," under the same conductor. The Huyton Choral Society performed, on the 9th ult., Cowen's "Rose Maiden," under Mr. J. Hodgson. At the Music School the same writer's very pretty new cantata, "The Rose of Life," was given on the 13th ult., by the choir of female voices under Mr. Argent; and at the same Concert Beethoven's Second Symphony in D was very well rendered by the students' orchestra, under Mr. Courvoisier. At the third and last Concert of the Runcorn and Warrington Musical Societies, both under Mr. F. H. Crossley, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and the same writer's "Walpurgis Night," and Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" were respectively given.

The sensation of the past month has been the visit of the Lamoureux Orchestra to this city on the 15th ult., when the triumphs realised in London and elsewhere were repeated. The programme contained as its chief number Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, of which an undeniably fine reading has to be recorded. This Concert may be assumed to form the finale, and it has been a brilliant one, of the musical season of Liverpool and district of 1895-6.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

By far the most delightful musical treat of the past month was the Concert given on the 14th ult. by M. Lamoureux and his splendid band—an enjoyment not interfered with by pauses to listen to incongruous second-rate vocalisation. For obvious reasons—notably for the sake of that proneness to make comparison to which we ought not to stoop, I suppose, but which, nevertheless, is irresistible—it would have been pleasant could we have heard the Parisian orchestra in our usual concert-room; but that uncomfortably seated saloon being pre-engaged, the immense St. James's Hall offered some advantages, in addition to its roomy and cushioned chairs, as well as some trifling disadvantages. Its resonance was admirable, and although the shallowness of the stage, compared with its great width, brought the strings very prominently to the front, and its flatness caused the wood-wind to be, perhaps, just a trifle subdued, yet the relegation of the noisier instruments to the alcove at the back was not ungrateful, although there really was no manifestation of that superabundant vigour of which one so frequently has to complain, for M. Lamoureux is always very highly to be commended for the restraint which he imposes upon that "splendour of the brass" which some famed conductors delight in. Of the orchestra as a whole it would be difficult to be too eulogistic. The strings were in every respect superb; the quality of the clarinets and bassoons was delightfully smooth, luscious, and equable; and the entire mass of sound produced was deliciously blended and free from that obtrusiveness of individual eagerness which so often shocks the ear and distracts the attention. For the first time in Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture we could feel that the display of the sailors' rollicking and blatant "Yo-ho!" was not the one purpose of the whole work; and, in the second subject of Beethoven's C minor Symphony, that the rasping violence which even the most celebrated of our Continental conductors enjoins was not universally regarded as necessary to the conveyance of the author's meaning. "Le Rouet d'Omphale" has been given here before; though not with such strict attention to its programme purpose, to the representation of the hum of the spinning wheel, or with the closing violin harmonies so clearly ringing and so tenderly dwelt upon as to lead to such an impetuous clamour for repetition as must have caused the accomplished Parisian players to doubt the depth of our appreciation of really good, unsensational music. Of one thing M. Lamoureux may rest assured, should he be tempted to pay us a visit in the autumn (as we hear is possible), when there are fewer attractions opposed to those of the concert-room, he would be certain to meet with a very warm and enthusiastic welcome. And, not for the pleasure and ease of singers alone, but for the sake of the increased richness of tone without any of that loss of brilliancy which has so often been threatened, let us put a speedy end to all controversy about the pitch, and enjoy the sonority of the "diapason normal."

The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company is, as I write, just concluding its annual spring visit to the Theatre Royal, during which Godard's "La Vivandière" has sufficed to attract many people who had grown tired of the old weary round of well-worn works and were eager for something fresh, even if the novelty were not of very high pretension. And it is a pity that the preparation of the "Meistersingers" was not sufficiently advanced to allow of more than a couple of presentations during the last week of the company's stay here. The growing popularity of Wagner's works, and the very widespread desire to study them, render very safe every effort to produce such of his dramas as are only moderately within reach of the resources of this company; and the "Meistersingers" is pre-eminently suitable, both by its standing alone among his greater efforts and by its needing rather a fair general excellence than any specially high individual endowment. Shortcomings there must, of course, be; but not so great as to overbalance the loyal desire of an audience to penetrate the design of the composer and to appreciate the skill whereby he seeks to portray—although with a humour which is somewhat ponderously expressed—the citizen life of an interesting mediæval time.

On Saturday afternoon, the 18th ult., the concluding meeting for the session of the Northern members of the Royal College of Organists was held in this city to listen to a Lecture on "Counterpoint" by Dr. Armes, of Durham, who, in his introductory remarks, frankly acknowledged that he would have preferred to speak upon some other subject on which the received maxims were less confused and never contradictory; but that, for the sake of students, he thought it desirable (pending such a conference of experts as might be able to settle all disputed points) to have a clear general understanding as to what is required from would-be graduates in music. Very concisely Dr. Armes proceeded to lay down certain conditions which ought, in his opinion, to guide students aright and attention to which should lead to success. In proposing a vote of thanks (which was seconded by Dr. J. F. Slater), Dr. Hiles congratulated those present who might be engaged in preparing candidates for Durham degrees on their thus having received from the lips of the permanent examiner in the faculty definite directions as to the course they could wisely take with respect to a subject concerning which grave differences of opinion exist.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

The provincial musical season is rapidly drawing to a close. At Newcastle, on Tuesday, March 24, Dr. William Rea's Amateur Vocal Society performed Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," in the Town Hall. The principal vocalists were Madame Emily Davies, Madame Marie Bellas, Mr. Braxton Smith, and Mr. John Nutton. Mr. J. H. Beers was principal first violin, Mr. T. W. Ritson presided at the organ, and Dr. Rea conducted. The performance, which, on the whole, was very creditable, was listened to by a large audience with much appreciation.

On March 27, also in the Town Hall, Newcastle, the Northumberland Amateur Orchestral Society gave its annual Invitation Concert, when Overtures by Beethoven and Schubert, the Ballet music from Gounod's "Faust," and Schubert's "Tragic" Symphony in C minor were performed. Mr. J. H. Beers conducted.

Several creditable performances of sacred works were given in the churches of Newcastle on Good Friday. Among others may be mentioned the first part of Gounod's "Redemption," which was given in the Cathedral Church of St. Nicholas, under the direction of the organist, Mr. John E. Jeffries, and Sir John Stainer's "Crucifixion," which was performed at Jesmond Parish Church, at St. Peter's Church, and at St. Stephen's Church.

The annual meeting of the Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union was held in the Town Hall, Gateshead, on the 14th ult., when a letter from Dr. C. Hubert H. Parry, having reference to the recent performance of his oratorio "Job," was read, in which he gave it as his opinion that the choir had an all-round array of qualities which placed it in the very first rank of all those he knew in the country. The choir now numbers 419 active vocal members, which is an increase of 173 upon the preceding year. The work announced for performance at the first Concert of next season is Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

At Sunderland matters have not been progressing altogether satisfactorily during the past season. The Philharmonic Society, which has an excellent record, extending over thirty-six years, has made a not inconsiderable financial loss on the season's Concerts. For several seasons past similar results have been shown, and the committee feel strongly that the time has arrived when the matter should be remedied in one way or another. The Society has done such excellent work in the cause of good music for so many years that the present apathy of the public towards it is difficult to understand. Internally and artistically the Society is in excellent condition. The members are enthusiastic and persevering in their efforts to attain the highest state of proficiency, and the committee is willing to adopt any reasonable measures to meet the desires of the public. It is to be hoped that the tide of adversity will speedily turn, and that the Society will soon be again flourishing, financially as well as artistically.

At St. Thomas's Church, Sunderland, on Good Friday, Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and selections from "The Messiah" were performed, under the direction of Mr. George F. Vincent.

The Sunderland Amateur Operatic Society gave performances of Sullivan's "Iolanthe" during the week commencing the 20th ult., under the direction of Mr. George F. Vincent. The performances were successful in every respect.

Dr. Thomas Hutchinson, who has for many years been organist of Silksworth Church, Sunderland, has just been appointed organist of the Parish Church, Darlington, the position having recently become vacant by the death of Mr. Marshall.

The South Shields Choral Society gave, on March 25, a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," with Madame Emily Squire, Miss Muriel Palmer, Mr. Braxton Smith, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint as principal vocalists; Mr. J. H. Beers as principal first violin, and Mr. M. Fairs as conductor. The Concert was much appreciated by a large audience, and was pronounced to be the most successful of the Society's recent efforts.

On the 3rd ult. a performance of Haydn's "Creation" was given in the Wesleyan Church, Consett, under the direction of Mr. W. Lowrie. The principal vocalists were Miss Cecilia Armytage, Mr. Tom Child, and Mr. Charles Knowles.

On the 17th ult. the Bishop Auckland Musical Society performed Mendelssohn's "Christus" and "Hear my Prayer" and R. H. Walthew's "Pied Piper of Hamelin." The latter work is a characteristic setting of the well known poem and deserves wider recognition. Madame Esther Palliser, Miss Hannah Jones, Mr. Dyfed Lewis, and Mr. Whitney Tew were the vocalists, and Miss Clara Asher, solo pianist, took part in the Concert, which was directed by Mr. Kilburn, the Society's conductor.

The Durham Amateur Orchestral Society gave a Concert at the Town Hall, on the 10th ult., and presented a very attractive programme, including a Serenade by Götze, Novelletten by Gade, Russian Suite and Serenade by Wüerst. The vocalist was the Rev. G. W. Anson Firth, and solo instrumentalists, Madame Etta Newborne, Mr. Numa Zabban, and Mr. W. J. Magall.

On March 23 the Tynemouth Amateur Vocal Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" in the Assembly Rooms, North Shields. The soloists were Miss Emily Davies and Mr. Braxton Smith, and the performance was conducted by Mr. Wm. Bird. This was the most ambitious effort which the Society has made so far, and also, it is pleasing to record, the most successful.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

Mr. George Howson (one of the pioneers of popular music) passed away, after a long illness, on the 4th ult. His interest never flagged, and by his generosity in presenting the band-stand for Hanley Park, and founding a scholarship at the Tonic Sol-fa College, he formed a link between the musical public of twenty-five years ago and the present time. By his death the Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society lose a President of many years' standing.

The Newcastle St. George's Choral Society presented Haydn's "Creation," on the 9th ult., before a good audience. A choir of eighty voices, under the leadership of Mr. Thomas Mason, sang with much taste and evidence of good training. Miss M. Jaques, Mr. F. Owens, and Mr. F. W. Norcup were the principals. Mr. G. Lawton and Mr. J. Alcock accompanied.

Encouraged by the success attending previous efforts, the North Staffordshire Amateur Operatic Society engaged the Theatre Royal, Hanley, for six nights, commencing the 13th ult., and mounted "The Pirates of Penzance" and "The Yeomen of the Guard." The performances were highly successful, and the principals displayed conspicuous ability in their parts. It is satisfactory that the financial result will recoup the promoters for their spirited venture.

The annual meeting of the local branch of the Tonic Sol-fa College was held at Hanley on the 11th ult. The report and balance-sheet were presented and adopted, and the Board of Examination, consisting of Messrs. T. Turnock (chairman), J. Garner, J. A. MacGregor (vice-chairman), W. E. Wood, J. Foulkes, F. J. Stone, S. Hughes, G. Glover, W. Hollinshead, W. H. Boote, T. Davies, and C. Oliver (hon. secretary), was elected. Mr. T. Turnock was selected as candidate for the College Council.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

That the Oxford public is perfectly bewildered with and rather weary of endless Concerts has been demonstrated with more force than ever during the term recently closed. There is probably no remedy for this state of things, as apparently everybody wants to give Concerts and nobody to go to hear them; but it can hardly be called satisfactory. The only advantage of it is that it makes it unnecessary for the chronicler to record Concerts that were attended by only a handful of people.

The public Classical Concerts were able to get together a good audience to hear Dr. Joachim on February 18, but the Orchestral Concert was poorly attended. Dr. Joachim also played at Mr. Farmer's Concert on March 8, and was in remarkably good form. Seldom, indeed, now-a-days does he play so much in one evening as he did on this occasion. Another notable feature in this series of Concerts was a programme of madrigals a week later.

The Choral and Philharmonic Society's performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Dr. Parry's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," on February 13, seemed to interest few, though Dr. Parry is well known in Oxford. Dr. Parry conducted the entire Concert, as the Society was at the time without a conductor. It has since been announced that it has been fortunate enough to secure the services of Mr. Betjemann, the well-known conductor of the Highbury Philharmonic, and that he will enter on his duties next October.

Sir John Stainer gave a Lecture full of information on subjects of which the vast bulk of musicians are entirely ignorant, on March 11, the subject being Tye's Mass "Euge, Bone." The whole of this most remarkable and difficult work was sung by the Professor of Music's Choir in a manner that did the performers the utmost credit. Indeed, but for an occasional tendency to lose the pitch, the rendering might be described as almost perfect.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The forthcoming musical Festival is assuming definite form and many necessary arrangements have already been concluded. The selection of a chorus of 300 voices has been made from a large number of applicants, and it is believed that the Sheffield Festival Choir will fully uphold the reputation of Yorkshire chorus-singing. Among the vocalists engaged are Madame Ella Russell, Miss Medora Henson, Miss Ada Crossley, Mr. Santley, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Plunket Greene, Mr. Herbert Grover, Mr. Arthur Barlow, and others. Mr. August Manns has been retained to conduct, and will bring with him the Crystal Palace orchestra. Dr. Henry Coward has been appointed chorus-master and Mr. J. W. Phillips organist. The Festival will consist of four Concerts. The works selected are "Elijah," Parry's "Job," Berlioz's "Faust," and Sullivan's "Golden Legend." Two of the Concerts will be completed with miscellaneous selections. The hon. secretary of the Festival is Mr. E. Willoughby Firth, 20, Bank Street, Sheffield.

The Sheffield Musical Union gave a Subscription Concert in the Albert Hall on the 9th ult. The programme was made up of miscellaneous pieces, the most important of which was Mendelssohn's motet "Judge me, O God." This was sung with the fine tone and phrasing that have served to establish the high reputation of this flourishing Choral Society. Dr. Rogers's "The River floweth free," Jackson's "Sisters of the Sea," Bishop's "Now tramp o'er moss and fell," and an effective "Hunting song" by Mr. W. S. Jessop, the Society's accompanist, were the other choral pieces. Mr. John Dunn played Spohr's Concerto in D minor (Op. 9) and shorter pieces by Sarasate, Paganini, and Bazzini. In each he evinced a marked development in style and execution since he last played here, and his reception was very cordial. Dr. Coward conducted, and Messrs. S. Midgley and W. S. Jessop accompanied.

The Rotherham Choral Society performed "Elijah," in the Drill Hall, on the 16th ult. The Concerts given by this well-managed and enterprising Society have earned for it a reputation extending beyond the district, and the result is that in the matters of financial and musical support the Society is in a highly prosperous condition. Under the direction of Mr. Brameld, the performance under notice was worthy both of the fame of the choir and the beauty of the work. The attacks and phrasing denoted extreme care at rehearsals, and alike in volume, quality and balance of tone the singing of the choir was praiseworthy. An excellent orchestra, led by Mr. John Peck, played the overture and accompaniments with finish and accuracy. The principals were Madame Agnes Larkcom, Miss Annie Stonex, Mr. Tom Child, and Mr. Robert Grice. The latter, in particular, achieved a marked success in the music of the Prophet.

The Rotherham Amateur Orchestral Society gave a Concert in the Mechanics' Hall, Rotherham, on the 14th ult. The conductor, Mr. Charles Harvey, directed a capable and enthusiastic body of instrumentalists, who gave a steady and accurate performance of Mozart's Symphony in C. The programme included a novelty from the pen of Mr. C. H. Perrot, a member of the Society. This composition, a Festive March, is a pleasing work, and was much appreciated. The vocalists were Mrs. Stevenson, Miss E. Rhodes, and Mr. B. Barton.

Mr. Frederick Dawson gave the first of a series of Pianoforte Recitals in Erard's Room, on the 15th ult. He was assisted by Mr. Bromley Booth (violin), and together they gave a fine rendering of Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 12, No. 3) and Brahms's Sonata in G (Op. 78). Mr. Dawson played solos by Chopin and Liszt.

A Ladies' Choral Concert was given in the Music Hall, Surrey Street, Sheffield, on the 16th ult., at which Morgan's cantata for ladies' voices, "Zitella," was ably rendered, under the direction of Miss Foxon. Among the additional selections was Brahms's Trio for violin, pianoforte, and French horn, played by Miss E. Griffiths, Miss L. Foxon, and Mrs. Liddle.

The Sheffield Choral Union gave a successful Spring Concert, in the Albert Hall, on the 21st ult. The bulk of the programme consisted of selections from "Israel in Egypt." Sullivan's "Golden Legend" was to have been performed at this Concert, but as that work has been selected for the forthcoming Festival, the Committee of the Choral Union generously waived their choice and substituted Handel's massive work. The Society's subscribers and the public attended in large numbers and had the satisfaction of hearing the noble double-choruses rendered in impressive style. Conducted by Mr. S. Suckley, the members of the choir acquitted themselves with the utmost credit. In accordance with precedent, the soloists were selected from the ranks of the chorus. The soprano music was undertaken with marked success by Miss Pfeilschmidt and Miss Coates, and Messrs. Drabble, Senior, and Muscroft were also heard to advantage. Mr. J. W. Phillips contributed two well-played organ solos.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTHERN COUNTIES.

An attractive programme of Chamber music was presented by Miss Aylward and Mr. F. L. Bartlett at their Concert which took place in the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on the 8th ult. The Concert-givers, with Mr. Charles Ould as violoncellist, gave capital readings of Dvorák's Pianoforte Trio in B flat (Op. 21) and Mendelssohn's Op. 49, in D minor. Mr. David Bispham was the vocalist. The Sarum Choral Society commenced its forty-eighth season on the 14th ult. with a performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus." The united forces of chorus and orchestra numbered nearly ninety, and the oratorio received a satisfactory rendering. The principal vocalists were Miss Kate Cherry, Miss Annie Layton, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Walter Foreman. Mr. F. L. Bartlett led the orchestra, and Mr. E. W. Naylor rendered valuable assistance at the organ. The conductor was Mr. W. T. Bowey. Mr. Alfred Foley, assisted by the Salisbury Philharmonic Society, of which he is the conductor, gave a Concert at the County Hall on the 22nd ult. The programme was a miscellaneous one, and included Gounod's motet "Gallia" and Dr. C. H. Lloyd's choral ballad "Allan-a-dale," sung by the Society. The solo vocalists were Madame Belle Cole and Master J. Sterndale Bennett. Violin solos were played by Miss Daisy Ashton, and the orchestra was led by Mr. E. Jones, Mr. Foley conducting.

Costa's oratorio "Eli" was the work chosen for the Easter Concert of the Trowbridge Musical Union, which took place in the Town Hall, Trowbridge, on the 16th ult. The principal parts were sustained by Miss Alice Crawley, Miss M. Hackett, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. D. Harrison; and the orchestra was led by Mr. Duys and Mr. W. Millington. The band and chorus numbered 120 performers, conducted by Mr. H. Millington. At the Tabernacle, "The Crucifixion" was given on Good Friday by the choir, augmented for the occasion, the solos being sung by Mr. Trefellyn David and Mr. Harris-Watson. The rendering of the work reflected credit on the choirmaster, Mr. W. N. Haden, and the organist, Mr. A. R. Millington.

Performances of "The Crucifixion" were also given in the Parish Church, Lambourn, on Good Friday, and in St. Peter's Church, Marlborough, on the Wednesday preceding.

The visit of Madame Patti to Bournemouth, on the 10th ult., was the great event of the month. The Concert party, besides Madame Patti, consisted of Miss Ada Crossley, Mr. Robert Eadie, Mr. John Morley, the Columbians, Mr. John Lemmoné, Herr Franz Liebich, and Mr. F. T. Watkis. A selection from "The Messiah" was given by the St. Michael's Choral Society, in St. Michael's Church, Bournemouth, on the 16th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. A. W. Russe. Miss Ruth Gandy, Miss Gwendoline Scott, Mr. W. S. Blandford, and Mr. Howard May were the solo vocalists, and the organ accompaniments were played by Mr. H. Holloway. On the 24th ult. Madame Newling's ladies' choir gave a Concert, of which Henry Smart's cantata "King René's Daughter" was the chief feature, at the Shaftesbury Hall. Mrs. Charles Rebbeck, Mr. C. E. Tinney, and Mr. J. E. Hambleton also contributed to the programme.

"The Crucifixion" was sung in St. Mary's Church, Southampton, on Good Friday, the solos being taken by Mr. F. Noyes and Mr. S. Kendall. The Southampton Philharmonic Society announced a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" for the 28th ult., too late for detailed notice this month.

The Wimborne Choral Society had chosen Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" for its last Concert this season, and, under Mr. H. J. Eaton's careful direction, that work was performed in the Victoria Hall, on the 9th ult., before a good audience. Miss Maud Bond, Miss Bessie Elliott, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Charles Constable were the principal vocalists, and the orchestra was led by Mr. Whitehead Smith.

On the 7th ult. the members of the Harmonic Society presented their leader, Mr. Whitehead Smith, with a small purse of gold, in recognition of the valuable services he had rendered the Society, and the members of the Choral Society presented their conductor, Mr. H. J. Eaton, with a handsome ivory and silver bâton as a mark of appreciation of the able and patient way in which he had trained the class. The two Societies have worked together with marked success during the past season.

The Portsmouth Temperance Choral Union performed Handel's "Messiah" on Good Friday, in the Town Hall, under the direction of Mr. W. E. Green, who deserves commendation for the efficiency attained by the Choir under his leadership. The orchestra was composed of the Royal Marine Light Infantry Band, augmented for the occasion. The soloists were Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Maud Baker, Mr. Braxton Smith, and Mr. W. H. Brereton.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

With Eastertide, music in Yorkshire practically comes to an end, and the people, like the youth of Ipswich on an historical occasion, "disperse to cricket." During the last week of March, however, the end of the season was marked by a spurt of musical activity that gives us something to record. So far as Leeds is concerned, two Concerts of more than ordinary importance have to be chronicled. On March 21 the Leeds Permanent Orchestra, a young institution, whose opening Concert was noticed in The Musical Times for March last, gave a second Concert, and fully confirmed the good opinions expressed on its first appearance. It is greatly to be desired that the institution may really prove both "permanent" and prosperous. Under Mr. Alfred Benton's very able direction a programme of music, not too exacting for a "popular" audience, yet for the most part not unworthy of a self-respecting society, was thoroughly well played. If only the Society has courage to give a series of Concerts at short and regular intervals, and to include one work of some importance in each programme, it ought to achieve ultimate success. It certainly deserves it. The same orchestra took part on March 26 in the performance of Gounod's "Redemption" given by the Leeds Choral Union. This was also a first appearance, and the excellent chorus-singing indicated that Leeds can with ease supply a couple of choruses, though it is more doubtful whether it can supply as many audiences. Whatever may be the value of Gounod's music, it affords no very severe test of the capabilities of a chorus, so that we must wait till the new Society attempts something rather more exacting before we are able to accurately gauge its powers. Mr. Benton conducted; the principals were Miss Palliser, Madame Dews, Messrs. Lloyd Chandos, Browning, and Douglas Powell, with Miss Wilby and Mr. T. Child in minor parts, and the playing of the newly-organised band was thoroughly satisfactory. The Leeds Symphony Society, which is chiefly amateur in its composition, gave a Concert on March 24. A rather leisurely performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony was the most important thing in the Concert, which was conducted by Mr. A. J. Gutfeld. Miss Nellie Allaun was the vocalist, and sang some of Stanford's Irish songs very pleasantly. On March 28 yet another local orchestra, calling itself the "Leeds Orchestra," gave a Concert, the programme of which was of more than ordinary value. Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, a couple of standard Overtures, and a Violin Concerto by Vieuxtemps were played with considerable success. Mr. E. Elliott was both solo violinist and conductor. The special Musical Service during Holy Week has for many years past been an important event at the Leeds Parish Church. On March 30 Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion was given with orchestra, but without organ, a drawback referable to difference in pitch. Now, however, that some attempt is being made to solve this question in a practical manner, it is perhaps not too much to hope that before another year passes it may be possible for organ and orchestra to be used together. Though the performance was not quite up to the high standard of the Parish Church in finish, it was very creditable, and in many respects excellent. The principal soloists were Miss Wilby, Mrs. Fisher Heath, Messrs. T. Child and J. Browning; Mr. Benton, the Parish Church organist, conducted. The remaining Leeds Concerts may be passed over briefly. On March 19 Mr. Christensen gave a Pianoforte Recital; and, on the 21st, Mr. Herbert Walton showed his conspicuous ability as an organist at a Recital on the fine organ in St. Mark's Church. Mr. Rawdon Briggs gave the second of his two Chamber Concerts on March 23, when Mozart's D minor Quartet, Beethoven's Serenade-Trio, and Brahms's fine Pianoforte Quintet (Op. 34) were played with great refinement by Messrs. Briggs, Bridge, Holme, and Hatton, with Miss Eisele as pianist. A capital miscellaneous programme was offered at the Concert in aid of the Railway Servants' Orphan Fund on March 25, when Madame Henson, Misses Hilda Wilson and Sarah Berry, Messrs. Herbert Grover and Bispham, with Mr. F. Dawson as solo pianist, generously gave their services. On the 20th ult. Miss K. Brigstocke, a local pianist, with the assistance of Mr. Gutfeld as violinist and Mr. Walenn as vocalist, gave a very pleasant and interesting Concert, works by Dvorák, Brahms, Schumann, Lachner, and Chopin forming an exceptionally good programme.
